"Why, art much concerned regarding this maid, I vow!" I laughed boisterously. "Hast fallen in love with her pretty face?"

"In faith, I think I have," he answered, so solemnly that I roared again.

"Then shalt have my aid," I said, clapping him on the shoulder, "for of all afflictions thou has been seized with the worst. I say it knowingly."

"Yet seem in no haste to cast off thy own fair share of the affliction," returned he, smiling in his turn.

So, in my official character, I asked my boon of Briseis, which she graciously granted, saying that if I feared for the maid's safety she would take her as her own especial waiting-girl, thus keeping her within watch, "for thy follower is a brave man, I hear," she said, "and well deserve some recompense for his devotion to thee."

Hugely delighted, Atris at once brought them to Kronos, and placing Izitla with the Queen, as desired, installed her father in our palatial house, where we heaped every kind attention possible upon him, and almost caused a youthful glow to faintly tinge his aged cheeks.

Only Valdo, sternly practical, and ever with face set against women and their wiles, shook his head, saying 'twas a thousand pities that Atris had ever seen the winsome maid.

"For me," he grumbled, "I shall go through as I have managed till now, with a keen and trusty sword as my only companion; and one, moreover, that never plays you false, nor leads you into reckless, foolish, ape-brained schemes."

That was his philosophy; as for Atris and myself, we only laughed at him and said we'd take the risk.

The Crocodile Bait.

"WHAT, my boy there? He is a pure-blooded East Indian, aren't you, Decoy? You see, sir, he speaks pigeon-English tolerably well, though. That is because I brought him up from a baby. Why did I give him such a peculiar name? Thereby hangs a tale. While we're sitting here under the awning on deck, I'll spin you the yarn.

"Calcutta is much improved since my young days. Then there was hardly any steam navigation. The big East Indiamen came to anchor at Kedgeree, thirty miles down, and sent freight and passengers up in lighters.

"I had never been up country any distance. So as the rice wasn't coming in very fast, I made arrangements for a little jaunt up the Hooghly after pea-fowl. I hired a native boat-owner, who spoke fairly good pigeon-English, to take me some fifty miles up river.

"The boat had a roofing over the stern to keep off the sun, and I enjoyed the day part of the trip very well; but what with the stifling air and mosquitoes, at night it was almost intolerable. So after we got as far up as Bramapore—a small native village on the left bank of the Ganges—I paid off the boat owner and his men. Then, taking up my gun and a few traps I had brought along, I went ashore to the only thing like a house of entertainment the village afforded. It was a low structure, with thatched roof and mud walls, divided up into perhaps a dozen sleeping rooms, the size of a closet.

"I hired a native to sit by my canvas cot all night, and keep a big palm-leaf fan going. Sleep? Well, there wasn't much for either of us. Big lizards, singing out 'ghek-hoe' as plain as I can say it, chased beetles and mice in the cloth ceiling overhead all night long. I could hear big toads 'flop' along the floor every moment. Mosquitoes sang inside, and outside the bullfrogs kept up a roaring chorus—jackals and owls joined in.

"Next day another man landed from a native boat and hired one of the rooms. He was an East Indian, rather well educated, and spoke English with fluency.

"I soon discovered that he was an agent for the Zoological Society in London. His business was employing natives to catch for him different birds and animals. These he sent to a Calcutta agent in a big lighter which he had chartered. The tiger cats in the yard I soon found belonged to Nana—the only name I knew him by. And the same day a boa-constrictor was captured in the reeds by the river, and was boxed up and put aboard the lighter.

"Of course I was greatly interested in what he had to tell me of his various adventures. He had assisted in the capture of elephants in Ceylon, lions in South Africa, and had taken tigers in the jungle pitfalls.

"'What I look for, Sahib,' he said, as we were talking together the morning after he came, 'is the big crocodile that has slain more men of Bramapore than I can count upon the fingers of both hands.'

"'To capture him?' I asked, in surprise, for I supposed that only the young or half-grown monsters were taken for the purposes Nana represented.

"'The Sahib has said it,' was the cool reply. 'Nana has man who throw the noose with skill; I hope by to-morrow to lure the crocodile far enough from the rushes so that we can overpower it.'

"'But how?' I questioned again.

"Now, at the best, Nana hadn't a very prepossessing face. His features were regular enough, and he was no darker than a Brazilian as to the colour of his skin. But there was something cruel and sinister in his expression. And when I asked the last question, the yellowish centre in the pupils of his eyes expanded and contracted like those of the tiger cats in the cage.

"'I have that my secret,' he said; but I said nothing more.

"Of course, I was curious to find out his secret; but I said nothing, and presently took my gun for my daily tramp.

"How hot it was! Not a breath of air stirring, and the sun pouring down from a cloudless sky. I began thinking that I had been a thousand times better off under the ship's awning, drinking cool sangaree, than potting pea-fowl with the thermometer at 102 degrees in what little shade there was.

"Then, too, it was terribly still. The sharp chirp of a big species of cricket was the only sound excepting the soft gurgle and flow of the muddy Ganges, a few rods distant—till all at once I heard a baby giving tongue most lustily.

"If this had sounded in the direction of the village it would not have seemed anything unusual; but Bramapore was half a mile distant, and the noise proceeded from somewhere near the river, whose parched banks were barren of verdure. A few beds of rushes and a big boulder or two were in sight, and nothing more, till at the edge of the rushes I saw a black baby crawling on its hands and knees as fast as it could, and shrieking like a little demon.

"Well it might! For, all at once, as I hurried forward, I saw the enormous snout of the very biggest Indian crocodile I ever saw before or since, poked up through the rushes a little in the rear of the baby. Before I could pull myself together the monster's shoulders and part of his mud-caked body were clear of the edge. There would be no time to rush forward, grab the little one, and beat a retreat.

"Dropping behind a boulder, I cocked my right-hand barrel, which was loaded with heavy swan-shot. The crocodile in clawing himself upward over a clay hummock exposed for one brief moment the dingy-white patch of flesh behind the foreleg, which, next to the eye itself, is considered the most vulnerable spot. Resting my gun over the boulder, I aimed for this and fired.

"The swan-shot, at such short range, clumped together with deadly effect. The immense reptile uttered a sort of bellow, and heeled over on its side. At the same moment a shout from a jungle patch a few paces away caused me to turn suddenly.

"Nana, followed by half-a-dozen natives carrying small coils of flexible coil rope, came running towards me. Nana's face was distorted with rage, and as he neared me, I saw him snatch his short tulwar, or native sword, from its sheath.

"Of course, there was only one construction to be put upon his action, though for the moment I did not understand what my cause of offence had been.

"'Stop, you black scoundrel!' I shouted. But he was as wild as a Malay running amuck. He never paused an instant, despite my levelled gun; and, seeing that in another moment he meant to cut me down, I aimed at his upraised arm and fired.

"Well, the barrel was only loaded with birdshot, but it was quite effectual. Nana dropped his tulwar with a a yell of pain, and two or three natives behind him, who were slightly peppered, turned and ran for dear life, followed by their uninjured companions.

"I had aimed hastily, and only about half the charge had struck the East Indian in the fleshy part of the arm. He snatched up his turban and bound it up, cursing me the while in the choicest Hindustanee.

"'You brought it on yourself,' I said, as coolly as I could, while I was reloading—for I didn't fancy his fiendish look in the least.

"Nana didn't seem to hear what I said at all.

"'Five thousand rupees I have lost by this,' he yelled, pointing with his left hand to the crocodile, which was in the agonies of death. 'Five thousand rupees that I was to have for taking the big man-eater alive!'

"'Would you have had him swallow that baby?' I said indignantly, as I turned towards the little one I had nearly forgotten.

"If you believe me, sir, the black child, certainly not over a year old, had one end of the rope round its little waist, while the other was made fast to a dead stub.

"Then I saw it all. This was the brute's secret for decoying the crocodile from his muddy bed! I don't get angry very often, but when I do, I'm mad clear through.

"'Get out of this, you copper-skinned hound!' I shouted, throwing up my gun. 'Quick time, too, or I'll put a double charge of shot through your worthless carcase!'

"Well, Nana was wise enough to take the hint without any delay. And he didn't go back to the inn, either. I untied the naked young one, and carried it up to the village. No one pretended to know anything about it. The brute had probably bought the baby for a few rupees of some of the very poorest and most degraded of the natives, and they, of course, would not let themselves be known. The man whom I employed as an interpreter told me very coolly that I musn't think anything of such little affairs—they were common enough in this part of India. I think he was rather inclined to blame me for spoiling Nana's plans.

"I congratulated myself on having prevented a foul murder, but I could get no thanks for it from anyone—not even from the rescued infant. So, quite disgusted, I packed up, hired another boat, and took the young one back to the ship. My stewardess was a Mahrattah women, and her husband, my cook, persuaded her to take care of the child.

"We went back, and loaded for Ahangai, the stewardess and her husband staying by us for three round deep-water passages. I got quite fond of Decoy, who grew fat and tough every voyage.

"When he was three years old, he would follow me about like a little dog, and at five he would go up the rigging like a monkey.

"Time went by, and when Decoy was ten I came to Calcutta with him as my cabin-boy in the old Akbar Castle. We were ashore for next day's marketing one evening, and Decoy, I noticed, was very uneasy as we started back for the landing-place.

"'Sahib Cap'n got him pistol?' he asked, as he came trotting up behind with the great vegetable basket. And I said: 'No. Why?'

"'Bad man keep watch, Sahib Cap'n, all time we to market—man one arm no good,' he said.

"We had just got to the upper end of Garden Reach as Decoy said this, and I was making some careless answer when someone ran up behind me with an ugly-looking knife in his left hand.

"Decoy sang out, and, dropping his basket, grabbed the man round both knees, just as I turned in time to dodge the knife blow, which dashed little Decoy quite badly in the shoulder. But he hung on like a trump, and a minute later I had the fellow disarmed and handed over to the native police.

"As you may have supposed, it was Nana, who had managed to recognise me after all those years. And when he appeared before the magistrate next morning when my complaint was entered, you should have seen his face, when it came out in the examination that little Decoy was the black baby he intended as crocodile bait.

"He was sentenced to hard labour for ten years, I think. I hope he got it, too—the hardest kind. Decoy has been with me ever since. Please God, always will be while I live—eh, Decoy?"

THE ISLE OF LEPERS.

THERE was an awful beauty on the Gulf of Georgia that summer night. It was as if all the golds and scarlets and purples of the sunset had been pounded to a fine dust and rolled in from the ocean in one great opaline mist.

The colouring of the sky began in the east with a pale green that changed delicately to salmon, and this to rose, and the rose to crimson—and so on down to the west, where the sun was sinking into a gulf of scarlet through which all the fires of Hades seemed to be pouring up their flames and sparks. Long, luminous rays slanted through the mist and withdrew swiftly, like searchlights—having found all the lovely wooded islands around which the burning waves were clasping hands and kissing. The little clouds that had journeyed down to see what was going on in that scarlet gulf must have been successful in their quest, for they were fleeing back with the red badge of knowledge on each breast. Only the snow mountains stood aloof, white, untouched—types of eternal purity.

Through all that superb riot of colour that heralded the storm that was sweeping in from the ocean moved a little boat, with a flapping sail, lazily. In it were a man and a woman. The woman was the wife of the man's best friend.

They had left Vancouver—and all else—behind them in the early primrose dawn. Trying to avoid the courses of steamers they had lost their own, and were drifting. In less than an hour the storm was upon them. All the magnificent colouring had given place to white-edged blacks. Occasionally a scarlet thread of lightning was cast, crinkling, along the west. Then in a moment, followed the deep fling and roar of the thunder. Fierce squalls came tearing up the straits where the beautiful mist had trembled.

The little boat went straining and hissing through the sea. As each squall struck her the sail bellied to the water. There was no laughter now, no love-glow, on the faces in that boat; they were white as death, and their eyes were wild. Veins like ropes stood out in the man's throat and arms, and the woman could not speak for the violent beating in her throat. She held on to the tiller with swollen hands and wrenched arms. When the boat sunk into the black hollows she braced herself and looked down into the water, and thought—of many things. And through all his agonised thought for the woman, the man had other more terrible thoughts too.

Straight ahead of them arose the white, chalky shoulder of an island. He realised that he was powerless to avoid it. There was one low place, sloping down, green, to a beach of sand, but the sharp outlines of rocks rose between them—and there was no shelter from the wind. Still, it was their only chance. That or death. (He wished afterwards that it had been death.) He braced himself and pulled at the ropes until spots of blood quivered before his eyes.

"Port!" he yelled. "Port hard!" But the woman gave one gesture of despair; her hands fell from the tiller and she sank in a heap to the bottom of the boat.

It seemed but a moment till the boat struck and they were struggling in the waves. But a strip of headland now cut off the worst fury of the storm. The water was calmer; and as the man was a powerful swimmer, they, after a fierce battle with the waves, reached the shore and fell, dumbly, in each other's arms, upon the beach, exhausted.

Suddenly, as they lay there, above the noise of the wind, the waves and the crushing to pieces of their boat upon the rocks, another sound was borne to their ears—a long, moaning wail that was like a chant of the dead, so weird and terrible was it.

They staggered to their feet. Coming down to them from a little row of cabins above were a dozen human creatures, the very sight of whom filled them with terror. Some were without eyes; others without hands or arms; others were crawling without feet. And as they approached they wailed over and over the one word that their poor Chinese tongues had been taught to utter: "Unclean! Unclean! Unclean!"

Both the man and woman understood; but the man only spoke. "Great God! It is D'Arcy Island!" he said in his throat. "The island of lepers!"

The woman did not speak; but she leaned heavily upon him. The waves pounded behind them, and the firs on the hill above them bowed, moaning, before the storm—some never to rise again. And still, above everything, arose that awful wail: "Unclean! Unclean!"

The man looked down upon her. Already she seemed far, far from him. She had lost everything for him—but he was thinking, even now, of what he had lost for her. They were stranded upon an island whereon there was no human being save the lepers placed there by the British Government—an island at which steamers never landed, and from which escape was impossible, unless they signalled—and those two dared not signal—for lepers there are only silence and opium—and death.

His voice shook when he spoke again:

"What accursed luck steered us here!" he cried bitterly.

Then the woman spoke, lifting herself from him and standing alone.

"It was not luck at all," she said steadily, "it was God."

Then suddenly she cast all her trembling, beautiful length downward and lay prone, with her face sunken to the wet sand. And lying so, she clasped her hands hard, hard behind her neck, and cried out in a voice that lifted each word, clear and distinct, above the storm—so deep, so terrible was it with all passion, all submission, all despair—the most sublime prayer ever uttered by a woman: "Oh, Thou God—Who hast guided us two to the one spot on earth where we belong! I see! I understand. Oh, Thou awful God—Thou just God!"

The lepers, crawling back to their hovels, left those two alone; but their weird wail still sank through the falling darkness—"Unclean! Unclean!"

CHAPTER XLVI.

UNDER THE BLACK WING.

"WANTS another pick-me-up," said the cabman to himself as he received his orders to drive to Wimpole Street. "'Bliged to go to the doctor, after all. Lor', what a blessing it is not to be born a swell! Ain't got nothing to do; money comes in without having to be out all weathers, fare or no fare, and then not having enough to pay the guv'nor and the yard. Consekens is they sets to work on their B.'s and S.'s all times o' the day to kill time as they calls it; and the end on it is, time's too much for 'em and they gets killed instead. Ah, seems precious hard lines to be a poor man sometimes, but it's a blessin' arter all, leastwise it would be if the guv'nor'd give me a better horse. Gann with yer! Never see a lady on a bike afore?"

This to his horse, as one of the two-wheeled vehicles was steered rapidly by.

"All right, old man, I forgives," continued the cabman, with a broad grin; "what are we a-comin' to next! Why, if I'd seen her first it would ha' made me shy, let alone a horse. It would ha' made my missus blush."

Bractoun's throbbing weals increased in their smarting as the cab was driven across the Park, and by the time he reached Wimpole Street the thirst for money to free himself from his difficulties had given place to an intense desire for retaliation upon someone.

"Curse him! he shall pay for it in more ways than one," he muttered, as he got out stiffly. "Wait."

"All right, sir," said the man, and then to himself, "look as if you'll want a hambylance. My word, he do sim bad!"

The door was answered this time by Rancer, who had just returned, and he drew back to admit the familiar friend and patient.

"Where's your master?" said Bractoun sharply.

"Library, sir."

"I'll go in."

Rancer did not hesitate, but opened the outer baize door, looking upon Bractoun as one whom his master would see at any time, saw him turn the handle of the inner door quickly, and enter, and then closed after him the thick baize door which deadened all sound.

Consequently he did not hear Bractoun's cry of surprise and rage, nor, as the inner door closed and that at the top of the stairs, as he went down to the pantry, the sounds which followed.

Startled, but hardly surprised after the first moment—for the sequence of events seemed natural that Bractoun should follow his wife upon her flight to him—Murray recovered himself after being violently thrown back by the sudden assault, and after a brief struggle, dashed his infuriated assailant staggering away.

Brief enough encounter, but the moments were sufficient to enable a feeling of determination to flood Murray's brain—to die sooner than give up the woman he worshipped to him who would part them; while, frantic with jealous rage, the desire to kill was growing in Bractoun's heart.

Both stood panting with exertion, and for a moment Murray turned to where Olive lay motionless upon the couch.

Bractoun saw the wildly passionate look in the other's eyes, and a low, angry utterance that was hardly human escaped his lips. Maddened by pain and rage, he made as if to spring at Murray again, and nerved by the sight of Olive, and fully aware of his superior power, the latter stood firmly on his defence, meaning to close with him or disable him with a blow—anything to gain time enough to get the insensible woman away. He knew that they would not be interrupted. Shut in by the walls of that substantially built old place, no sound would reach the servants, and even if a cry were heard there would be no interference, for more than once he had met a surgeon there in consultation over a painful case, and stood by while some slight operation was performed. The room was secure from intrusion when visitors were there; and, feeling this, Murray's brain was active as to what he had better do. For all compunction was for the time gone. Olive had taken refuge with him, and, no matter what was at stake, in his then state of nervous exaltation he was prepared to go to any extreme.

The next instant he was awake to the fact that his adversary was as ready, and that it was a case of life or death.

For there was a sharp click, click, and Bractoun raised the pistol he had snatched from his breast, and took careful aim at his adversary across the table.

Murray did not hesitate; he dashed round the end to strike the pistol up, when there was a flash; he felt as if he had received a tremendous blow on the left arm which spun him round, and half stunned, he heard the sharp clicking sound again. Then, recovering himself, he once more dashed at Bractoun.

Again there was the flash, and the blow, as the smart crack of the pistol rang out—a keener and more cutting blow, which sent him staggering back, to sink upon his knees by the fireplace, conscious of a deathly sickening sensation, and incongruously enough noting the smoke and the foul odour of discharged gunpowder.

Then, as he knelt there, confused and for the moment helpless; he saw through the noisome vapour Bractoun turn his back, and the pistol again cocked, before he raised his arm once more, and took aim at the figure on the sofa.

A spasm ran through Murray, and he tried to rise, but could not, but only gaze wildly for what seemed to be a long period before there was a dull rap.

The pistol had missed fire.

An oath rang upon his ears now, followed by the click of the pistol as it was cocked, and the chambers revolved.

Once more Braetoun took aim at the insensible figure, but with a cry of despair Murray was upon him, armed now, for in the brief instant he had snatched the poker from the fender; and as Braetoun drew trigger, Murray used all his remaining force in the delivery of a blow from which Braetoun dropped as suddenly as if he had received his own bullet in the brain.

Sick at heart, and half fainting, Murray reeled to the couch on the other side of the table, after flinging the poker aside, striking feebly here and there to sweep away the smoke, which, assisted by his natural giddiness, interposed between him and Lady Braetoun.

He did not see that the last bullet her husband had fired had passed into the wall several feet above her head, but dropped upon his knees mentally, as well as bodily, stunned and helpless, filled as his brain was by the one supreme horror that Braetoun in his jealousy had slain the woman he loved.

For some moments he remained motionless, his hands to his throbbing temples, gazing at her in mute despair, while in the utter silence which now reigned, the thin blue smoke wreathed softly above their heads, rising slowly toward the ceiling.

"Dead!" he groaned, at last; "dead! and through me. Olive, Olive, my darling, speak to me—one word!" and in his profound misery he caught her hand in his, and pressed it wildly to his lips.

At the touch, Olive's eyes slowly opened, and she gazed straight before her in utter vacancy, seeing nothing, recalling nothing, till he bent more over her, when as her eyes now met his, they remained for a time fixed, till the reality of where she was and why she had come, came back.

With a look of horror she sprang from the couch and stood gazing at him. Then backed towards the door, as he slowly rose to his feet.

"Roderick—my husband—where is he? What has happened? He came here and I followed him. Why don't you speak?"

As she backed away in her horror and dread of the wild-looking, dishevelled being who came slowly toward her, she kicked against something with her heel, and slight as was the impediment, she nearly fell, while in recovering herself, she saw almost in the same glance the pistol against which her foot had struck, and her husband's prostrate figure, half hidden by the table, and grasped the fact that the room was full of smoke.

With a wild cry she ran to where Braetoun lay, and flung herself upon her knees by his side, trying to raise him, looking wildly in his face, feeling his heart, her hands passing rapidly over his face, and ending by drawing his head upon her lap.

"Dead!—dead!—too late! You have killed him!"

Still half stunned, and with the deathly faintness upon him, Murray stood supporting himself by the other end of the table, swaying to and fro like a drunken man, and watching her with half closed eyes.

"Help! help!" cried Olive at last, but in a low half-stifled voice. "What have you done? My husband—my poor, weak husband; he is dead—he is dead."

She drooped over him now with a piteous wail, kissing his face passionately, and calling him to come back to her by every endearing word she could command, but there was no reply, no movement, and a wave of rage and despair swept over her, as she now raised her head and with eyes flashing with the fierce anger within her breast, she turned upon Murray.

"You have murdered him!" she cried; "my own husband! Wretch! Monster! What have you done?"

Murray uttered a low groan.

"Too late—too late!" she cried. "You have been like a curse to me and mine. Roderick, my husband, I forgive and love you still. Oh, come back to me, come back. Help—a doctor—help! Why do you not come to him? Your cruel work! Do you not see?"

"Olive, for God's sake, hush!" groaned Murray at last, feebly, as he clung to the table to save himself from falling. Then in his mental anguish, as he saw her redouble her caresses, and listened to her words, he gasped faintly: "Have some mercy—have some pity for me. It was in self-defence—yes, in self-defence. What could I do?—he would have killed me."

"Well," she cried, in her mad rage against him; "why should he not?—you, you who would have robbed him—have dealt a cruel blow at the man you called your friend. Roderick! Husband! Oh, my own, my——"

"Are you quite pitiless?" groaned Murray. "Better that he had killed me, or that I had slain myself. I was defending you—it was for your sake."

"My sake!" she cried wildly. "Oh!"

"Yes: I was fighting for you more than for my wretched self. Olive, have pity. After what has passed can you throw me off like this! You cannot turn away now. Am I nothing to you now?"

"To me?" she cried, with a look of horror. "Nothing! I came to save my husband, and I find him dead."

"No, no," he panted feebly, "for God's sake, don't tell me that. It is not true. If I have killed him it was to save your life—the pistol—I thought you were dead."

Olive gazed at him wildly, and his distorted face endorsed her belief that he was mad.

"You came to save him? No!" he cried. "It is a horror, but I tell you it was in self-defence."

He paused to try and gather strength, and there was a low, piteous wail in his tones as he went on:

"Don't—don't turn from me now—at a time like this, when you had fled to me—to your only refuge—to him who has always loved you more than his own life. Don't turn from me now. No one will believe the truth, but there will be time for us to escape."

"Oh!" panted Olive, and she looked wildly at the door for help, but in her terrible dread of the ghastly-looking speaker, she did not dare to call.

"Be calm—try and be calm," he continued. "Give me time to think. The world is nothing to us, and I could not bear to be separated from you now. If I have killed him we should meet no more. Yes, that is it. We must go at once. There will be no shame for you. The sin is mine. No—no sin, no shame, dearest, for you, and I am glad. You are a free woman, now, and you cannot turn from me. I struck him down as he fired at you. Murderer? No, no, you must not call me that!"

He tried to take a step towards her; and she uttered a cry of horror, and in her abject fear she clung to Braetoun's arm.

But she had no further cause for fear. Murray lurched forward, and barely saved himself from falling. He noticed her manner, though, and his tones were full of pleading, as he went on faintly:

"You shrink away. Oh, my love, my love! Can you not see that there was not room in this world for us both? He tried so hard to kill me—to kill us both, but it was not to be—it was fate. Now, quick—listen—while I can speak—before this dreadful cloud closes me in—Olive—you must help me. We must go before it is too late."

"Oh!" she cried wildly. "Can you speak to me like this?"

"Yes," he said, as he pressed his hand to his hot shoulder. "There is no time to lose. Place first; some place of safety."

She turned to him fiercely, and with such a look of horror and disgust that he groaned.

"Oh, my husband, my husband!"

"A woman!" he cried, "a true woman, after all. And yet I loved you, and have proved it even now. Well," he said feebly, once more, "it does not matter. Look there, on the table—the draught I was about to take to end all my misery, when you came and seemed by your presence to snatch me back to life. There is the bell—call for help.

You know what it means. They may not believe, they will not believe, for I shall not speak. I have killed him, and at the worst I can but die. Take him to your heart again; forgive him. I tell you it would bring me back to life."

She had in her dread crept closer to her husband's side, and once more drawn his head upon her lap, as she knelt, too much stunned by her position to act, and feeling in her horror that there was protection for her in the act; and as Murray wildly uttered those last words, Braetoun moaned.

CHAPTER XLVII.

A Woman at Bay.

Murray winced as he heard the cry of hysterical joy which escaped from Olive's lips:

"Roderick!" she cried; "speak to me, oh, speak!"

He slowly unclosed his eyes and stared at her; then round the room, and full consciousness came back as his eyes lighted on Murray. Then with a quick, angry gesture, he thrust himself away from his wife and rose slowly and stiffly to his knees, to glare at both in turn.

So fierce and full of disgust was his look that Olive shrank away, crouching low upon the carpet, and, after trying to speak, covered her face with her hands to try and check the passionate outburst of tears which would have vent.

"Ah! Curse it all!" groaned Braetoun, as he made an effort, rose to his feet, and pressed his hand to the side of his head, took it down and looked at it as if expecting to see blood, but there was none.

Then he turned his eyes upon Murray, who still stood by the table, to which he held fast, and uttered a low savage laugh. Another searching look showed him where the pistol lay upon the carpet.

He crossed to it, tottering a little; and he groaned again and nearly fell as he stooped painfully and picked up the weapon and cocked it, stood looking from one to the other and ended by pointing it at Murray, who drew himself up a little and looked him unflinchingly in the eyes.

Olive uttered a cry, and started to her feet.

"Roderick!" she cried.

"Down, curse you!" he said, turning the pistol muzzle upon her. "The right position for an abandoned woman like you."

"Oh, for pity's sake, don't think that of me, dear, don't think that," she cried, as she threw herself at his feet, and tried to grasp his knees.

"Keep away!" he said savagely, and he struck her with the pistol barrel across one hand.

Murray uttered a groan, but he did not stir.

"Roderick; how could you!" she cried, with a piteous wail. "You don't know—I was frightened—I was afraid of something terrible if you two met, and I came on to try and prevent it."

"Yes, but you managed to get here first," he cried mockingly.

"Oh, Roderick, you don't understand."

He laughed derisively. "I understand enough. Lucky for you, madam, that he struck me as he did, or you'd have had a bullet through your wretched heart."

Perfect confirmation of Murray's words, and Olive's jaw dropped, and she stared wildly at her husband as she realised the danger she had escaped. Then she tried to speak to him from where she knelt, but no words would come; and as he stood there pistol in hand, he seemed to find a fiendish pleasure in threatening her with it, and then changing its direction to Murray.

"I could easily do it," he said; "but he has his dose—a dose for the doctor—and one that he won't forget if he lives; and as for you, it would be a mercy to shoot you, but I'm not going to hang for a harlot."

"Roderick!" she cried, with her hands clasped to him. "You are half mad! You don't know what you say."

"Half mad? Enough to make me quite; but it doesn't matter now. Things have come to the worst, and I hope you'll be happy in your lot."

Again her lips parted to speak, but no words came, and in her despair she turned to Murray, but he made no sign, and Braetoun laughed bitterly.

"Well," he cried, "why don't you make him turn me out of his house? Your house, I suppose, now."

"Roderick!" she cried. "I cannot bear to hear you speak like this. Pray, pray listen to the truth."

"I know it," he cried mockingly; "and I'll have a divorce, and shame you both if it is possible. That is what you would like, but there shall be damages tacked on to it heavy enough to ruin him. You'll get the old man to pay them for him, though you could not get him to help me; but it does not matter. I'm reckless now."

Olive had risen, to stand silent and too indignant to attempt any defence. With her brow knit and eyes half closed, she waited until her husband had ceased speaking and replaced the pistol in his breast.

"There," he said, with a savage look at the half fainting man, holding on still by the table; "the old fashion has gone out, and they say that you can't have satisfaction in a case like this; but I've had mine. Do you hear, Murray? I've had one, and I've a greater one to come yet—a better revenge yet, as you'll see."

He limped across the carpet, wincing the while with pain, and involuntarily raising his hand to his injured head. But before he could reach the door Olive was by his side, and had caught his arm.

"Roderick!" she cried passionately. "You cannot go and leave me."

"Why not? What are you to me? You are no longer wife of mine. Let go! Do you hear me? Let go!"

He wrenched himself free, and sent her staggering back, to save herself from falling by catching at a chair.

But she recovered herself and ran to him again.

"You cannot mean to do me this horrible wrong," she cried piteously. "I forgive you all you have said, but take me away."

"Take you away!" he roared. "No; go to your paramour."

"Oh!" she cried; and she pressed her hands to her ears.

"Go to the cowardly hound who has not spirit enough to defend you."

"Don't, don't, pray don't talk to me like this. It is too horrible. Take me with you—take me home."

"Home!" he cried. "You have no home, unless it is here. Take you with me? Never; and besides, I am going there!"

"Oh!" she cried with a shiver of misery, "you don't know what you are saying and doing. Roderick, dear, listen to me. I am your own true wife. You must—you shall believe me. Listen before it is too late."

She was clinging to his arm, and looked in his eyes imploringly, but with a savage oath he threw her from him again.

"It is too late," he cried. "I tell you that you are no wife of mine. Go to that cowardly hound, as you have chosen him. Take you with me!"

"Yes, yes; you cannot leave me like this."

"Can't?" he cried bitterly. "I'm going straight away to the only woman who ever loved me, so as to be at peace."

"No, no," she cried frantically; and once more she clung to him; "you cannot mean it. I forgive you everything, only take me, take me to your heart again, and believe me true."

"I believe you to be as vile and bad as woman can be," he cried. "Loose my arm, curse you! Let go, before I do you a mischief. You escaped it once; am I to try again?"

"Yes, anything. Kill me," she cried, wild with horror now, "anything—only believe me, and take me away from here."

She uttered a wild shriek, and staggered back, sobbing hysterically, for he had struck her savagely with the back of his open hand across the face; and with her arms thrown up as if to hide the blow, she fell backward, without an effort to save herself, heavily on the floor.

He turned as he flung open the door, to dart a savage look of hatred at Murray, and then stood in the open doorway to gaze when Olive had risen to her knees, and in spite of all, even the blow, strove to reach him again; but before she could reach the door he had dragged it to, and directly after there was the dull thud of the outer one of baize, followed by the sharp sound of a key being turned.

The noise of something behind her made her turn sharply and stand with her back to the door, about whose panels she hurriedly passed her hands, feeling blindly for the handle, and in her dread pressing it to, instead of drawing it open.

For at last Murray had left the spot where he had stood so long clinging to the edge of the table; and he was now advancing towards her with extended hands.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

FOR LIFE—OR DEATH.

As Murray advanced slowly towards her with his eyes full of appeal, Olive made one more effort to tear open the door and escape; but in her horror and excitement she turned the handle in the wrong direction, uttered a cry of agony, and dashed across the room to avoid the outstretched, trembling hands; but before she reached the window with an insane idea upon her that she must fling it open and spring out, a low agonising cry thrilled her to the heart, and she turned at bay, trembling, and unable now to stir, though feeling that she had nothing more to bear.

For she grasped the fact that Murray was reeling, his eyes were fixed and vacant, and his hands were striving feebly to catch at help.

Then he uttered a low piteous cry, his glazing eyes staring and his words rang in her ears;

"Olive, where are you? In pity help me—I love you—don't let me die."

As the last words were uttered, Murray's hands dropped to his sides, and he fell forward upon his face, while for the first time Olive fully grasped the fact that he had been indeed fighting in her defence, for the carpet where he had stood, clinging to the table, was deeply stained with blood, and he was now apparently dying at her feet.

Stunned by the horror of her position—forsaken by her husband, thrown, as it were, entirely upon Murray's mercy, and with him wounded perhaps to the death, Olive stood with eyes starting and hands clasped, looking down at him, for the moment not daring to move.

In a confused, helpless way, she realised that her reputation was at stake; that at all costs she must escape from that house, and go back home or seek her father; but how could she go and leave Murray dying there without first giving the alarm by summoning help?

It was horrible! What would the servants say—what would they think of her! They must have heard the noise, and perhaps were now listening at the door.

"God help me! What shall I do?" she cried; and she ran to the door, trembling so, that she felt that she must faint; but as her hand rested upon it and she was about to rush out and flee as if for her very life, she turned to gaze back at the prostrate figure with a feeling of horror and dislike rising above every other thought. But at the sight of the blood staining his shoulder, a shudder ran through her, the natural compassionate woman asserted itself, and with a piteous cry she sank down upon her knees to search for the wound and tear out first her handkerchief and then his, to try and stop the bleeding.

Before a minute had passed she awoke to the fact that her efforts were perfectly useless, for the bandages she applied were soaked directly; and, forgetful now of everything but the peril in which Murray seemed to be, she rose from her knees and rang violently at the bell, to stand shuddering as she gazed down at her hands.

There was a sharp knocking at the baize door almost directly after, then the clicking of the lock, and Rancer entered looking rather wild, and as soon as he saw his master extended on the carpet, he cried excitedly:

"Then they were shots! Oh, my lady, what does it all mean?"

"Don't, don't talk! Help!" she cried.

The words were hardly needed.

Rancer had had his experiences, and he was already throwing off his coat and turning up his sleeves.

"No, no, a doctor—a surgeon," panted Olive.

"Directly, my lady. Must do something first. Here, you ring again—twice," he cried, with the authority of one who knew what he was about. "Don't let any come in, but send the maid to fetch Mr. Gainsford. She'll know where."

"Yes—yes—Gainsford," she said excitedly; and she obeyed, and waited trembling in the hall till the woman servant came up from below, heard her half incoherent orders, and as if she too were accustomed to emergencies, went to the front door at once and hurried out.

Olive passed back into the library, to find Rancer busy on his knees with Murray's coat ripped off with a knife, and the shirt sleeves cut away from the left arm.

"Open that wash-stand, my lady. Basin, sponge, and water, please—quick!"

"Yes, yes," panted Olive; and she obeyed eagerly, bringing the objects asked for, to set them on the floor.

"Towels out of the stand drawer, my lady."

These were hurriedly fetched, and Olive looked on with lips quivering and hands tremblingly eager to help.

"How was it, my lady?" said the man sternly, as he busily prepared to bandage the wounds, which were bleeding freely. "But there, I know. His lordship had one of his attacks on, I suppose. Not fit to be trusted at such a time. I've seen how bad he's been getting. Regularly mad, I suppose?"

"Yes, yes, half mad," cried Olive, snatching at the exclamation.

"Quite, to do this. Now, my lady, hold his arm, please."

Olive shuddered, but knelt down at once, and took the white, firm arm between her hands, seeing that the bullet had ripped a gash deep into the biceps on the inner side, almost as cleanly as if it had been done with a knife.

"This isn't bad, my lady," said the man, as he bandaged away; "only bleeds freely. It's that shot right through the shoulder that I plugged. I'm afraid of the bone. Try and bear up, my lady. You're helping me almost like a trained nurse."

"Don't speak to me, please. Go on."

"Oh, yes, my lady; I'll go on, but you'd better keep on talking to me. You musn't faint, please, now. I shall want you to get a bottle and glass from the cabinet directly. You'll see one with L—i—q—u—— A—m—m—o—n—— on it. Not yet. Hold the bandage tightly. That's the way. Blood comes through, but we're checking the bleeding, and Mr. Gainsford won't be long if he's at home. Very horrible for you, my lady. Where's the pistol?"

"I—I—don't know—I think Lord Braetoun took it away with him."

"Tut—tut—tut!" muttered Rancer, "and in such a state as he was. Thank you, my lady. There, that's a hospital knot. I used to be in the Middlesex, close by here."

He looked up with a quiet confident smile in the ghastly face gazing wildly into his.

"Will he die?" said Olive, in a strange whisper.

Mrs. Colonel Thornhill's Escape.

THE Hon. Tom Dunscombe, attaché of the Vienna Embassy in England, on sick leave, slumbered peacefully in the library at Sufton Court. Presently he awoke, shivered slightly, and, as his eye fell on a huge pile of MS. plays at his side, groaned audibly. "They must weigh quite two hundredweight," he murmured. "Critics, I fancy, must be a fortunate race; they only have to see such plays as are performed; they should have the readings of all those which are not. Think of reading all that. Still, the only way to stop this confounded Frenchman's game will be to change the play. To put a spoke in his wheel I'd wade through the lot, so here goes."

Animated with this resolution, the Hon. Tom resumed his reading, and after a good deal of "Pish!" "Bah!" "What rot!" "Pooh!" "Very likely!" "Idiot!" selected a four-act drama.

To judge from the rueful looks he cast on the MS. Tom was not pleased with his choice. "I am no expert on plays," he thought, "but if the critics don't give this beans may I never be promoted.

"However, it will suit the condition of things here, and as I am stage manager, they'll have to play it whether they like it or not." He then made out the cast, rang the bell, sent the parts downstairs, and crept upstairs to bed.

The Hon. Tom Dunscombe was generally subject at the fall of the year to a complication of disorders, which yielded only to special and peculiar treatment—a month in England, with some good shooting. The latter he generally obtained at Sufton Court, the seat of Colonel Thornhill, whose regiment was stationed in India, but as he regarded Tom more as a son than a friend, having been his guardian, the young diplomatist got to look upon Sufton Court as his home.

He had been delighted to find the house full. There was Mrs. Thornhill, the Colonel's young wife, who was in England on a flying visit to her sister, Lady O'Hara, and Sir Patrick her husband. The Damers, the Elibank girls, the young Finchs, and the Vicomte D'Artenare, a man of polished manners, unknown antecedents, seemingly rich, but with that undefinable something clinging about him which bespeaks the adventurer. Tom took a dislike to the Vicomte from the first. "Wherever did Mrs. Thornhill pick him up?" he thought, "and how is it they are so thick, and why is it he can't sing unless she accompanies him?"

Tom knew all about the Colonel's marriage. How he had met Mabel Desmond eighteen months before, a fashionable beauty then in the zenith of her popularity, and how her parents had badgered her into accepting a man old enough to be her father, but the largest landowner in Downshire.

After the marriage the Colonel, accompanied by his wife, returned to India, and here she was in England again on a visit, which he presently discovered had already lasted over three months. One morning Mrs. Thornhill informed Tom that an actress she had met in India, and who had since blossomed into the manageress of a West-end theatre, had prevailed on her to give a performance at her theatre for the benefit of the East-end seamstresses then on strike.

The manageress proposed that all the performers should be distinguished amateurs, and that, to prevent comparisons, a new play should be performed. Tom, who had had considerable experience in amateur theatricals, was then prevailed on to do the stage management. The first few rehearsals revealed a state of things which filled him with great uneasiness. He had cast Mrs. Thornhill for the heroine and D'Artenare for her lover, and before a week had expired he noticed, with a distrust he could not conquer, that the love scenes were being rehearsed much more frequently than there was any necessity for. Although Tom was quite aware that diplomacy engendered distrust, he could not help feeling alarmed when one day he came across them unawares in the conservatory. She was listening eagerly to the whispered words he was breathing in the soft ripples of her brown hair, his arm was round her waist, and she made no effort, during the few seconds Tom remained, to wrench himself from that forbidden embrace. Tom went straight to the library to think it over.

Whatever the man might be, adventurer, beggar, or scoundrel, it was evident that Mabel loved him with all the strength of her weak soul. Tom wondered what diabolical charm the villain could possess that Mrs. Thornhill should prefer a lazy, sensual dawdler to the English gentleman who was serving his country out yonder. He didn't believe the fellow cared two straws for the foolish woman, but he probably knew that the Colonel had been extremely generous in the matter of settlements. If she went off the track it would break his old friend's heart; he knew how the Colonel doted on his wife. But would she? As a woman of the world she must know that the stream she would have to cross—if she elected to follow this man's fortunes—was more terrible than the Rubicon. The stream was not crossed yet, but he could see that her footsteps tended that way.

How could he save her? The Vicomte was not his guest—lucky for him he wasn't—and he dared not tell his hostess that a constant wife was a noble and beautiful thing; but he could send a telegram to the Colonel, telling him to return home at once as his wife was dangerously ill, but not to wire back he was coming for fear of alarming her. If he did that, mused Tom, she would bolt before he arrived. He could send the Colonel a telegram and he did. He could also change the play for one which would provide no love scenes at least for these two. He could do that, and he did as we have already chronicled. He could also try to make it warm for the Vicomte and get him out of the house, and so cure his hostess of his mad infatuation before the Colonel arrived. He couldn't pledge himself to accomplish this, but he would have a good try.

Next morning the storm burst. Mrs. Thornhill sent for him and asked him why he had cast the new play so curiously. Tom looked her full in the face as he replied: "D'Artenare, to conceal his passion for Kate, is made to carry on with Maud, who he dislikes, so I thought it best to cast your sister for Maud."

Mrs. Thornhill turned deadly pale and left the room. She knew that her secret was discovered. Now for the others. "I say, Tom," exclaimed Sir Patrick O'Hara, a genial Irish gentleman, bursting into the library, where Tom was writing a letter to the London manageress announcing the change in the programme, "there's a devil of a row going on. You've cast D'Artenare for Reginald Bamber, my wife's lover, and me for George, Mrs. Thornhill's lover; I suppose it's all right?"

"Quite," was the calm reply.

"Well, I'm deuced glad of it, for I'm hanged if I can see any fun in making love to one's own wife."

"You didn't always speak like that, Sir Patrick," replied Tom.

"No, my boy; when I was a poor man, living on my estate in Ireland, before the death of the Admiral made me a rich one, I remember saying to Fanny: 'My darling, your great charm in my eyes is the entire absence of those qualities which command admiration in the fashionable world.' But since I've lived in an atmosphere of scandal and fine phrases, and mixed with people who, if not remarkable for original thought, can tear a character into such tiny little shreds that one would be puzzled to find the pieces, I've changed my opinions. I have noticed that husbands who are always dangling about their wives' skirts are not popular, and that, between ourselves, is what I complain of. My wife's never happier than when she's with me, and when anyone speaks to her she blushes and looks down. It makes me wild. I've told her a hundred times that bashfulness and simplicity are not understood in the great metropolis, but she won't believe it. Why, I give you my word, Mr. Dunscombe, it was only the other day I overheard a lady say that bashfulness was only another name for slyness. Nobody notices my wife now. They treat her like a housemaid. If I could only see her with a crowd of admirers in her train I should be happy."

"A crowd!" said Tom musingly, for an idea had just entered his mind, "a crowd!"

Sir Patrick winked. "The more the better," he replied, "there's safety in numbers. They'd all spy on one another."

"Now look here, Sir Patrick," said Tom, "will you be guided by me in this affair, and promise if you see your wife behaving as you wish, not to speak till I give you permission?"

"I will," replied the baronet.

"Well, I think I know a way of curing your wife of this excess of affection. It will be rather a shock, I'm afraid."

"Let me see her the centre of an admiring throng and I'll stand the shock. Hush! here she comes."

Lady O'Hara was a striking contrast to Mrs. Thornhill, her sister. A slim, shy, affectionate little creature, literally worshipping her husband.

"Mr. Dunscombe," she exclaimed, with as much asperity as she could infuse into her soft voice, "I don't like the play at all; the motive, to begin with, is wicked in the extreme, and some of my speeches are most heartless and indelicate."

"Indeed," said Tom gravely, "I thought I had exercised a most rigid censorship; I don't think there's a line suggesting anything by which the merest school girl could anticipate her future. Will you please read me the lines?"

"Patrick may read the speech; I shall not do so," said the little lady.

"Give me your part," said her husband, and he read: "There are thousands of ladies, my lord, who are keenly alive to the advantages of securing a husband a little older than the majority of husbands. The older he is the less chance of a young wife being subjected to personal violence—the older he is the sooner she will become a widow."

"We will cut that speech," said Tom, thinking of Mrs. Thornhill and her husband.

But the lady was still unappeased. "I don't think the motive a good one," she said; "my uncle, the Bishop of Zanzibar, has promised to be present."

"I don't see why your uncle should complain," interrupted Sir Patrick. "The clergy have it all their own way on Sundays, they might let us enjoy ourselves on week-days."

"Be quiet, dear. And then, why is Mr. D'Artenare to play my lover? I am sure Patrick would do it quite as well."

"I am afraid I can't agree with you there," said Tom. "The part is a very romantic one, and your husband's figure quite unfits him for romantic parts."

"I do not think so," said Lady O'Hara haughtily.

"Too stout," said Tom, shaking his head. "Now, the Vicomte will look the adventurer to perfection. Slim, pale, a beautifully shaped nose, and an air of distinction conferred by a first-class tailor."

But Lady O'Hara didn't like the Vicomte. "I think his stare most offensive," she said, "the way he looks at you."

"His looks may be a little more ardent than good taste permits. But looks are difficult things to interpret. He may only admire you as he would a beautiful picture. Remember he is pretending to be madly in love with you."

"Yes, that's the worst of it. I see in the part that he has to kiss me."

Sir Patrick now lost all patience. "Now, my dear," he cried, "do be reasonable; these pastoral sentiments are quite unfitted for the vortex of London society."

"Oh! Patrick, you wouldn't like another man to kiss me, would you?" she said, bursting into tears.

"I know how deep is your attachment," replied her husband soothingly, "but if you could only suppress it in public I should have no cause of complaint. Are you aware, my darling, that people call us the Siamese twins? Think of that. Now, if you can only innocently, quite innocently, my darling, contrive to inspire one of our friends with an incurable platonic passion."

The poor little woman gazed at her lord bewildered. "I am sure I couldn't," she gasped; "I shouldn't know how to do it."

"Tell everyone in strict confidence," said Tom gravely, "that you are a little weary of your husband; you would scarcely believe how greatly your popularity would increase."

Lady O'Hara shook her head. "I could never do that," she said, with an air of conviction, gazing fondly at her husband who responded with a groan, "unless I really grew tired of him, and as I am not likely to do that I must decline to play this part unless Patrick is my lover."

At this moment the Frenchman's voice was heard. "Keep him out of the way while I persuade your wife," Tom whispered, and the Baronet darted out.

"I can speak to you without reserve, Mr. Dunscombe, because you are such an old friend," said Lady O'Hara. "Some people find no attraction in goodness. My husband has sadly changed. He actually wishes me to imitate my sister."

"I should be sorry to see you do that," said Tom gravely. "I know I may confide in you," he continued, in reply to her questioning look, "for I am sure you love your sister very dearly."

"Oh, yes," was the reply. Lady O'Hara turned pale; she felt what was coming.

Tom went on: "Colonel Thornhill is my very dear friend. I have no right to interfere, but I cannot help seeing that people are talking about his wife as they have no right to talk. D'Artenare is a scoundrel, who has done this sort of thing before. Woe to the woman who listens to his insidious tongue."

Tom knew nothing of the Frenchman's past, but he wanted to frighten Lady O'Hara, and he succeeded. She gazed at him horror-stricken. Could it be possible that Mabel was prepared to wreck her husband's honour and outrage society? She thought of the paragraphs in the newspapers, and she thought of what her sister's life would be after she had slipped out of the public mind. She was not so unsophisticated but that she could picture two guilty wretches hiding away, probably under a false name, and the woman awaking one day to find the love look absent from the eyes of the man she had staked her chances of salvation for.

But supposing they were exaggerating the circumstances. Mabel, she felt convinced, loved this man; still she did not think she would cast the die, although the dice box was in her hand. She was acting imprudently, no doubt, but Mabel was older than she was, and perhaps after all——

She stopped thinking and looked at Tom, who had followed the train of her thoughts. "People who dream pleasant dreams on the edge of a precipice generally fall over." The momentary hope died away in Lady O'Hara's mind.

"Oh, Mr. Dunscombe, what is to be done?"

"You must save her," said Tom emphatically.

"I!" earnestly exclaimed her ladyship. "How?"

"By executing on this foreign gentleman what military men call a flank movement. Play the part I have cast you. Insist on constantly rehearsing with D'Artenare all the scenes you play together. And even when you are not rehearsing keep him by your side"—her ladyship gasped—"then gradually pretend to fall a victim to those fascinations which have exercised so baneful an effect on others. In a word, never leave your sister and this man together, and practise on him alone those charms which Sir Patrick foolishly wishes you to exercise on mankind generally." Silence.

"Oh, Mr. Dunscombe," broke in the little woman.

"You would not only please, and probably cure, your husband, but save your sister," went on Tom, with such an air of resolute conviction that his companion could only gaze at him in speechless amazement. After a most convincing speech Tom paused, and Lady O'Hara reflected. It was a dreadful thing to deceive one's husband, still it would only serve him right to punish him for daring to ask her to become what he called a fashionable wife. But to be obliged to tolerate the attentions of the Vicomte!

"Think," murmured the artful Tom, "your sister's honour; the cause is a good one."

Digitized by Google

That decided Lady O'Hara, and she promised to do her best. Mrs. Thornhill and the Vicomte were, of course, considerably surprised when they found that Lady O'Hara had withdrawn her objections to the Vicomte playing her lover.

Whatever Mrs. Thornhill's feelings may have been, she was compelled to remain silent. She knew the construction which would be placed on anything she might say. The Vicomte was secretly pleased with the arrangement. He would now have an opportunity of conciliating an enemy. His position was critical, and he could not afford to make or even defy enemies.

Acting under the advice of Tom, Lady O'Hara at first proceeded with great caution. She had hitherto treated the Vicomte with scant courtesy, but she now led him to believe that she had been wrong, and that she was becoming gradually impressed with his numerous good qualities. She had one great advantage in the game she had set herself. The Vicomte's knowledge of woman was extensive but not general. The women he had known thought too much in one way. Of English ladies he knew next to nothing, and consequently had but little belief in woman's purity. So he nodded approvingly when Lady O'Hara informed him that since her marriage she had been dying for a little freedom.

The hot blood surged into her cheeks as she said this. She realised now how loathsome was the task she had set herself, but she had a purpose to achieve and would not go back. So the Vicomte got to know that a few months of married life had convinced her that the matrimonial tie was a great hindrance to perfect enjoyment, that her object in lavishing on Sir Patrick those attentions in public—attentions which the Vicomte must have noticed—was to make him weary of her and insist on her doing that which all the while her soul secretly yearned for.

She listened to his pretty speeches and appeared to acquiesce in the plans he began to sketch, faintly at first, of a bright and happy future. Still it is doubtful whether she would have succeeded in supplanting her sister but for the tact of the Vienna diplomatist.

Tom had the healthy Briton's face, simple, manly, honest and ingenuous, not a genius, but with ten times the brain power of the Vicomte. He allowed his enemy to pump him, and noted with secret glee the greed which stole into the adventurer's eyes when he learnt that on the Admiral's death Sir Patrick had settled £3,000 a year on his wife for her exclusive use and benefit but that Mrs. Thornhill was dependent on her husband, who, he had every reason to believe, had lost heavily in the Calcutta markets.

This greatly simplified matters, and the adventurer now began to treat his hostess with marked coldness. Pale and haggard, with no suspicion of the truth, Mrs. Thornhill saw with suppressed passion her sister gradually supplanting her with the man for whom she had been ready to face anything. To quarrel openly she dared not. She made a stout fight at first to retain the Vicomte, but the £3,000 a yearsa dly handicapped her.

At first Sir Patrick exhibited the greatest satisfaction at the change in his wife's manner, but as the weeks rolled on he thought she was reforming too thoroughly. Of course, it was delightful when his wife explained that as she was in the springtide of her youth no enjoyment ought to be denied her in that or the summer period, for was there not an autumn and a winter in store for poor woman, and in the winter would not the sweetness of life fade, producing wrinkles, dull eyes grey hairs and neglect?

Now all this was very nice and very artless, and Sir Patrick professed to be greatly delighted, and was profuse in his acknowledgment to Tom, to whom he ascribed the change. But as the day of performance neared he was not nearly so pleased as he pretended to be. It was all very well for Lady O'Hara to tell him that he must be mad to think a woman's heart was a sanctuary in which only one image was enshrined; probably his wife was right, but there were ways of saying things, and, candidly, he didn't like hers.

And then there was that foreign cad, D'Artenare. As a sensible man he could see that it was necessary for people who seldom acted to constantly rehearse, but there was no reason why Lady O'Hara should spend the entire day with him; why, even her sister was disgusted with her lenity and treated her with marked coldness. He was quite aware that he had begged his wife to imbue some fellow with an incurable platonic passion, but he didn't think this looked like a platonic passion.

So Sir Patrick grew as miserable as Mrs. Thornhill.

About a week before the performance Mrs. Thornhill gave a ball, and issued a prodigious number of invitations. With a crowd of people in the house it would be very strange if she did not find some opportunity of demanding an explanation from the Vicomte. But Tom was on the alert, and Lady O'Hara insisted on dancing with the Frenchman the whole evening, to the surprise of the guests and the disgust of Sir Patrick, who, drawing Tom into the billiard-room, gave vent to his feelings.

"Now this is all your doing, Mr. Dunscombe, and although I gave you my word of honour not to interfere till you gave me permission, I'm hanged if I can stand it."

"Why, what's the matter, Sir Patrick?" asked Tom soothingly.

"That foreign devil and my wife."

"Why, didn't you say," said Tom, "that the happiest day of your life——"

"Why do you always throw that unlucky speech in my face?" roared the Baronet. "I wanted an army of lovers, not one sly sneak like that D'Artenare. I'll break his neck before the night's over."

"What has he done?" asked Tom.

"I'll tell you. I had occasion to remark to my wife yesterday that I had seen them in the park yesterday through my field-glasses, and that from the look on the gentleman's face I judged him to be making love. Now what do you think my wife replied. 'Oh, dear, you cannot think how delightful to a woman who has all the brightness and freshness of unsullied youth is the love-making of an accomplished Frenchman. The ingredients of love-making, Patrick, are of course known to all, but it is the mixing which imparts the flavour. Oh, the French are the only people who know how to mix.'"

Tom nearly went into convulsions.

"But that isn't the worst of it. I came upon them in the conservatory just now, and I heard my wife say: 'Oh, dear! Eleven o'clock to-night? How could I find my way to Belper Lane in the dark? If my husband——' and then that frog-eating brute interrupted her, saying: 'Your husband, my dear lady, is of no consequence. Keep his plate full at meal times and he is happy.'"

"What did you do then?" said Tom, biting his lips and making desperate efforts to preserve his gravity.

"What did I do?" cried the infuriated Irishman, breathing heavily. "What could I do with the promise

I made you staring me in the face? Nothing. I simply offered to dance with her. Would you believe it she told me to trot away and join the old fogies in the smoking room, and not to wait up for her, but to go to bed when I felt tired. Likely thing, go to bed. No. Relieve me, Tom Dunscombe, from that promise, and let me unbosom my soul in Belper Lane at eleven o'clock to-night."

At that moment a servant entered the room. Mrs. Thornhill wished to see him in the library. He found her greatly excited. Her husband would be home in an hour.

"Spare me, Mr. Dunscombe," she cried, "the scales have fallen from my eyes. Fanny has told me everything. How good you have been. But my husband! With that man here I dare not face him."

"Leave everything to me," said Tom. "I'll play his part next week. He shall leave here before your husband arrives."

Tom then had a conference with Lady O'Hara, and another with Sir Patrick, the result of which was that just as Mrs. Thornhill, half fainting, found herself in her husband's arms, Sir Patrick was administering a sound drubbing to the Vicomte D'Artenare in Belper Lane. A few months later Mrs. Thornhill accompanied her husband to India. Lady O'Hara goes out a good deal now, but never without Sir Patrick.

ARTHUR GOODRICH.

FOR A THOUSAND POUNDS.

"IF one of us only died what a good thing it would be for the other!"

So spake Felix Hynde a few minutes previously, as, preparatory to departing for a stroll to get rid of a fit of the "blues," he had stood carefully buttoning his overcoat.

Leaning back in his chair, Christopher Hewitt, with measured puff, had blown blue rings of fragrant smoke about his head, while enjoying dreams of a future that could never be his. His friend's remark, delivered so earnestly in a tone of great bitterness, had shattered his vision, and he had sat up to scrutinise the speaker's features through the uncertain twilight, and to think that he had never seen so weary a face before.

Hynde had gone—left in a miserable, melancholy mood—but his morbid utterance remained, and fitting itself to the rhythmical ringing of the bells of St. Dane's dinned itself into Christopher's ears, and presently put into his brain thoughts which appalled him.

"If one of us only died!"

Only he and Hynde could comprehend the awful significance of the speech and see the vista of terrible possibilities it opened out to them. Why, if one of them but died, the other one would be richer by £1,000. And in their present condition such a sum would be a fortune. Each was insured for that amount in a large life office. They had insured their lives together, years ago, when affluence was theirs, afterwards making wills, each leaving to the other his life policy in case of death before marriage.

In those days, these friendless orphans were young and careless. Both possessed good positions; each had a little money left him by his parents, and while their existence then was sunshine, both loved "the sweetest girl on earth"—the horizon on all sides was roseate, apparently prognosticating a life beyond, which they in their dreams oft enjoyed. They were fast friends—Hewitt had not a single relative in the world, and the only representative of the house of Hynde was an ancient aunt, whose means were so limited that but for her nephew, Felix, she must surely have starved—lived together, made no other friends, and admitted no outsiders to their confidences.

But the times altered. Clouds lowered o'er their house. Chris lost his position altogether, and Felix had his salary considerably reduced. Under the strain of this double drain, their resources soon diminished, and, Chris obtaining no employment, things went from bad to worse, until now the premiums of their insurance policies were within a day of being due, and they knew not how to meet them. Thus Chris reviewed the situation and sighed: "If one of us only died!"

He turned to his cigarette and endeavoured to float away again into the land of pleasant shadows, but the church bells rang out louder the parting words of Felix and gave him no rest. So he abandoned dreams, watched the glowing fire, and thought.

Yes, if one of them only died the other would be—well, not wealthy, but he would have sufficient to tide him and straighten the crookedness of the future. That was if one of them died.

"Well, why should not one die?"

The thought flashed through Hewitt's mind as he leant forward gazing into the fire. It seemed to have been born of a bright forked flame which lit the darkening room for a second. Outside, the bells caught it up—rang it out with a glee that was perfectly devilish—and seemingly to Chris announced his thoughts aloud to all the world, thoughts that were fearful, thoughts that frightened him, so that he stuffed his ears with his fingers, as though to shut them out; then there came a period of silence.

"Well, better for one to die," he thought presently. "Better for the other, better of course for both," and he laughed, then started back in his chair, for he fancied that Felix laughed out from the fire with him. He caught a momentary glance of Felix's face, wreathed in a malignant smile, ere it disappeared in the falling coals.

"Yes, one of us ought to die! Better one than both. Now which one—Felix or I?" So ran Hewitt's thoughts. Ah! that was the question—which? He was contented with life. He had grumbled occasionally, of course, and who does not when Fate presses unnaturally hard? Certainly he would not object to improving the conditions under which he lived it. Who would? Then, again, he was in love. A pretty face, crowned with a head of golden hair, and set with the bluest of blue eyes, which seemed to be the home of everlasting sunshine, floated across Chris's vision. Yes, he must live, and he must have money.

As for Felix—well, he was a bundle of complaints. A miserable cynic, he was never satisfied with anybody or anything, never on good terms with himself, and since he had been jilted, love to him was sour grapes. Even Diogenes was surely never worse than he. And had he not said: "If one of us only died"?

Of course, Felix was thinking then of himself, and the benefit Chris would derive from his death. Was he thinking that way? Was he going to commit suicide—the fool; or—and Hewitt grew clammy with a strange dread—was Felix going to murder him?

Murder him! How his skin seemed to undulate and quiver at the thought. Yet, perhaps, that was what Felix meant to do. He remembered now how taciturn Felix had become of late. But Hewitt determined that he would be one better, he would score the first point—he would kill Felix, and in such a way that no suspicion of murder, or even suicide, should attach itself to the death; it should appear purely accidental.

But he must be careful. Felix might strike the first blow, and then—Hewitt smiled as he thought how to score another point—how to prevent Felix, should he successfully attempt such a design, enjoying the anticipating reward—he would destroy the will he had made in Hynde's favour.

The idea amused him. What irony that would be to Felix; what a bitter disappointment. What irony to himself was the knowledge that, as a handsome living specimen of the Creator's omnipotence he was worth about £200 a year, when in full working order, and if sold right out on his physical merits would not command enough to provide them with drinks and smokes for a month.

Yet, as a dead man, as a useless, hideous corpse, he was worth £1,000. And the irony of the situation reflected the smallest of his own personality, showed him how utterly powerless he was to cope with the intangible sometimes that as nothing, nothing that he could feel, that he could take vengeance upon, and roused within him a wrath for which he could find no outlet.

Until Felix had spoken the fatal words, Hewitt had never thought how easily one could kill the other and enjoy the proceeds of the crime. That was probably because until now they had never been in such desperate straits. Had Felix kept his own idea secret, never uttering his reflections, he might with ease have carried it into action, for Hewitt was too much of a dreamer, much too contented with whatever position he found himself in to endeavour to rise above it.

But now he recognised the possibility, the practicability of the idea, though to ensure success he knew that great skill was needed, that great care would have to be taken so that there should remain no clue, which afterwards might prove his downfall. Then the death must not wear the appearance of murder or suicide. To all intents and purposes it must be accidental! Could he accomplish this? Could he kill Felix and make his death appear an accident? If he could, he saw £1,000 and happiness within his grasp! If he could not, then he himself would be the victim.

In such a contingency the pistol and the dagger were useless; the agent employed must possess an independent action and must defy discovery. Hewitt thought of poison, but of poisons he knew little beyond their names; he knew not which was the most efficient, the most difficult to trace. There was strychnine, nicotine, arsenic—arsenic! That seemed familiar to him. Of course, why had he not thought of it before! Felix was an arsenic victim; he took it regularly. If quite by accident he took an overdose it would kill him.

And there was no necessity for Hewitt to purchase the arsenic—that would have exposed him to considerable risk—for Hynde always kept a quantity in his desk. He bought the poison himself from a chemist in the Strand, to which fact this man would, later on, have to testify.

Now to administer it. Felix and Hewitt each had a liking for whisky—too much of a liking, perhaps—and the bottle was never allowed to become empty. A small quantity of arsenic in the spirit, of which Felix would undoubtedly partake when he returned, would settle the matter and he would be no more.

How easily the plot had smoothed itself into tangible, practical shape, and there was not the slightest chance of discovery.

"Felix must die!"

Chris spoke the words aloud, and the sound of his voice frightened him. He started up with a dazed brain—a mind clouded with a horrible phantasm. Had he been asleep and dreaming? No, everything had been too real, too practical. Gazing round the room he noticed that evening had given way to night, that the fire had burnt itself out, and he shivered. His lips were parched, his eyes tingled, and his brow was cold and wet with perspiration. He lighted the lamp with trembling hands and drew down the blinds.

He went to the cupboard and brought forth the whisky jar. He poured out a glass of the amber spirit, spilt some in raising it to his mouth, for his nerves were like slack wires in a wind, then, as the liquor burnt his lips, threw it beneath the grate and sank into a chair.

Perhaps it was poisoned already! Perhaps the very death he had so cunningly planned for Felix had been set for him. He sat silent for a while and his brain cooled. He realised that the thinking was past and that the time for action had arrived. He wiped his hands and face upon his handkerchief and went towards Felix's desk. As usual it was unlocked and he had no trouble in finding the small box labelled: "Arsenic. Poison." Taking it in his hand he emptied half its contents into the whisky and shook the bottle violently. Then he swept from sight the broken pieces of the tumbler, and procuring another, placed it beside the bottle on the table.

Then followed a hurried, frantic search for the will which he had given over to the care of Felix, but he failed to discover it. He turned out drawers, ransacked shelves, ran through books, and cursed at his non-success. But what folly this! He was safe now, of course, and he had Felix's will safe also.

Suddenly he heard Felix mounting the stairs. His step was light, and he was whistling as though he never had a care in the world. Hewitt hurried into his overcoat and hat, and opened the door of the room as Felix reached it.

"Hullo, Chris!" Felix said gaily. "Off for a stroll?"

Chris nodded, and noticed that Felix had indulged not wisely.

"You've left your morbid devil outside?" he asked with a forced laugh, without raising his eyes.

"Drowned him," was the laconic reply; "and I struck luck, too, my boy."

Chris hesitated on the threshold. He was fearful lest

Felix should drink the whisky whilst he stood there, and fall dead at his feet.

"Yes. Met old Barlow," Felix ran on lightly, "and borrowed a tenner. Have a cigar?" offering Chris a handful.

Hewitt's hand shook as he took one and lighted it.

"Your hand shakes, Chris," said Felix as he disrobed. Then his eyes fell on the whisky. "Artful dog. Had a quiet liquor, eh? Well, you've saved me some."

Hewitt strode to the door.

"Here, Chris. I've a little present for you." And as Chris turned back, "I couldn't afford it, but I knew your passion for rubies, so I bought it."

Hynde held out a ring of dull gold—a ring of old-fashioned and clumsy make—set with a spendid ruby. Chris flashed the stone in the light and admired it, but he felt as though his legs would give way every minute, for with one hand on the fatal bottle, Felix watched him with a gaze that seemed to penetrate his brain and read his thoughts.

"Want a sovereign, old man?" asked Felix.

Hewitt shook his head, and put the ring into his pocket.

"Stop and play chess?" said Hynde, drawing a chair to the table. "It's cold out; and, as I'm alive, you've let the fire out. Well, you're a good sort."

"Back at twelve," said Chris as he closed the door.

He almost fell down the stairs and nearly upset the postman outside.

"Anything for me?" he inquired hastily.

"Hewitt?"

"Yes," and he snatched the proffered letter from the astonished postman's hand, and rushed away, cramming it into his pocket as he ran.

Felix had said it was cold, but Christopher Hewitt was uncomfortably hot. He sped away from the busy street, and at last, out of breath, reached the Embankment and dropped into his seat.

When he returned, he knew he would find a dead man in his room. He wondered if Felix were dead yet.

Felix listened to Hewitt's clatter down the stairs and heard the door close with a bang. Then he sat down in the chair and pulled from his pocket an official-looking document—the last will and testament of Christopher Hewitt—which he perused with evident delight. A tap at the door startled him, and he rose as the servant came in and handed him a letter.

He tore open the envelope, and while he read the contents his eyes almost burst from his head. He reeled back with a cry—a cry of joy and despair.

He was wealthy beyond his most ambitious dreams. The letter was from Bell and Bell, solicitors, and informed him that his old aunt—apparently so poor—had just died, leaving him a fortune of £50,000.

Good Heavens! £50,000, and he a murderer! For ere now the ring which he had given to Chris—a poisoned bauble which, pressed upon the finger, injected into the blood a most virulent poison secreted in its centre—must have done its work.

But there might be time yet to save him. His friend's favourite walk he knew was the Embankment, and he hurried into his hat and coat. How his brain reeled. He grasped the bottle, poured out a glass of spirits and drank it at a gulp; it would calm his nerves! It calmed his nerves for ever. He fell with a gasp to the floor in the agonies of death.

Chris felt in his pockets for a match to light his cigarette, his hand came in contact with the letter and the ring, and he pulled them out. Who could the letter be from! He had not a relative in the world. He ripped it open, read it beneath the light of a lamp, and strangled a cry of horror in his heart.

Heir to £8,000, and a murderer! Good Heavens, what a fool! What a fate! The letter was from Bell and Bell, and told him that Mrs. Janet Crawley had left him £8,000!

Crawley? Where had he heard that name? Then he remembered she was Felix's aunt, and how, when once she called upon them, Felix being absent, he made tea for her and entertained her.

But he was a murderer! No, perhaps it was not too late to save Felix, and he turned and raced in the direction of his lodgings. He pushed the letter back into his pocket and thrust the ring upon his finger. He felt a slight scratch, ran a few steps farther, then crashed to the earth a corpse!

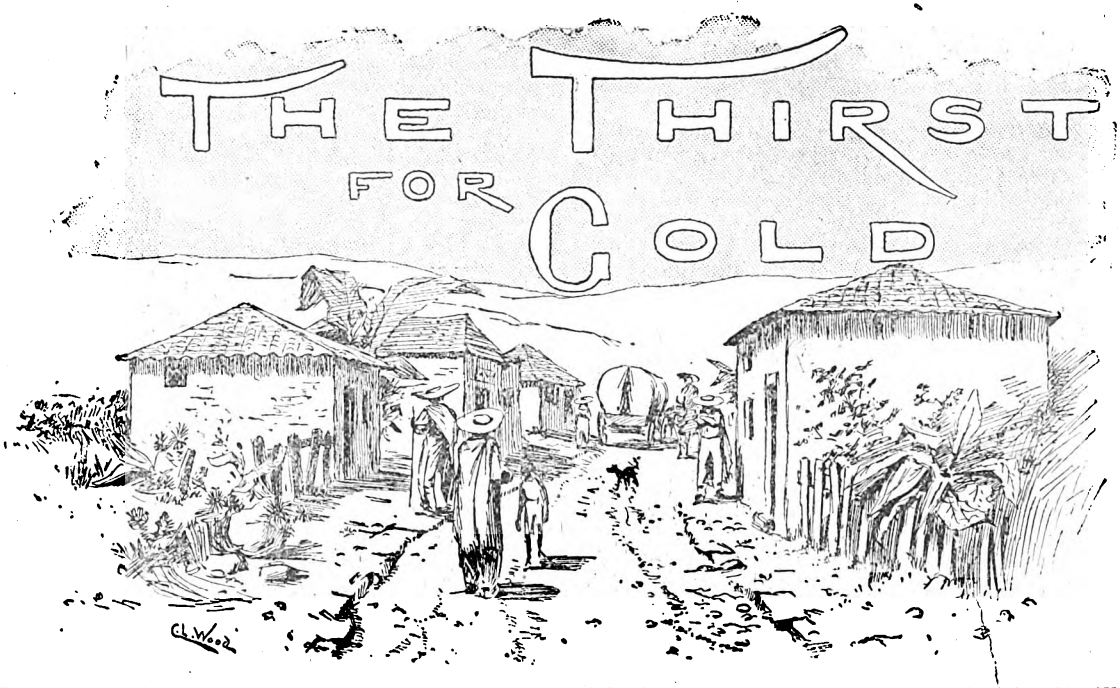
THE THIRST FOR GOLD



LAST July, when the days were long, and the sun blazed down into the valleys, until even the lizards hunted the shadows of the rocks, I was driving down to the railway with a party from Ballena. The dust was suffocating, and our journey was by no means one of pleasure. The sun was near the meridian when it was suggested that we should stop to water the team, and take a bite of lunch. A halt was made beneath a grove of live oaks, and we were about to discuss the contents of our hamper when a pedestrian came in sight.

She—for it was a woman—came trudging along the road, half hid in the cloud of dust raised by her feet. As she drew near we saw that she was poorly clad. Her face was reddened by the sun where the perspiration had washed away the grey dust with which she was otherwise covered. She was by no means old, and, despite the dust and sunburn, showed traces of beauty. Her evident weariness could not hide her grace.

On reaching our halting-place she laid down the little bundle she was carrying, and inquired if she was on the Campo Road. On being told that she was not, and that she was increasing her distance from that settlement, her eyes filled with tears and she sank down upon the withered grass by the road-side, sobbing bitterly. Of course every effort was made to console her. At length she regained control of her emotions, and told us her story and the object of her lonely tramp.

She and her husband had lived, content and happy, in a little mining town in the north; but the bad times came, and he was thrown out of organisation. Then the council of two planned for the future; but, alas! the planning was in vain, and the little hoard for the rainy day rapidly waned. The rain was not a passing summer shower, but a pouring season. There were dark misgivings for the twins, but they had the light of youth and hope to help them.

One day they read in a city paper a wild, fabulous tale of the lost Peg-Leg Mine of the Colorado Desert. To be sure, it told of drought and death, but the pockets of the dead men were always found filled with gold. Then came a lusting for the treasure at the end of the rainbow and the self-assertion which told the young man that he could do that in which others had failed. The resolution was taken, followed by a parting, with bright hope shining through the tears and kisses.

Thus the young husband left the bonnie wife and started on his mad errand. She had heard from him once from the little village on the edge of the sandy waste. Since then days had come and gone, months had followed each other, nearly a year had passed, and now, weary of waiting, the woman sought for him. "He is out there," she said, "and living. I dream of him. I can see him waiting for me. My heart even tells me how he looks."

Here her face was illuminated with her confidence. We dared not tell her what our knowledge and experience taught; that his bleached bones were lying where a blessed death had relieved his direful agony. What was the use? She was evidently half-mad. We did what we thought best—told her "if he were alive he would soon come to her. That to attempt to find him without a guide was certain death." At last we persuaded her to return with us to the coast, but only after promising that we would aid her in her search. On our return to the city, she was placed with a charitable employment, under mild restraint.

The summer had passed away, the autumn rains had come, and with them the presumption that the desert was as endurable as it ever becomes, when one of my clients came to me with a story of a wonderful mine lying out in the arid waste. He had a sketch-map showing bearings by which it could be found. The map, with some marvellously rich specimens of quartz, had been found by an Indian upon the body of a dead man out upon the desert.

I laughed at the story and ridiculed my friend for entertaining it; but he insisted that every fact pointed to riches, and that the lost Peg-Leg only waited for us to locate it. Well, I am somewhat of a fool myself at times, so I allowed him to persuade me to undertake the journey. The consideration is not material: but it was to be satisfactory to me in any event.

Our point of departure was Campo, a small settlement near the western edge of the dread and dismal sands. Our party consisted of my client, an Indian guide, and myself. We were well equipped for our search, being provided with a good waggon and team, provisions, bedding, tools, and instruments, and a cask of water.

Soon we were out upon the trackless waste, where we found much to interest us, but nothing to inspire a desire to visit such a region again. Great dunes of sand rose before us like gigantic billows of grey; now and again these gave place to bare rocks. Far away there seemed to be lakes, from which the sun's rays glinted as from a mirror. These, when we reached them, proved to be beds of gypsum or of salt. At times the horses dragged their weary way through deep, white sand, and we alighted and walked to ease their load.

Again we rolled over bare rock, or hard clay, where great crevices gaped open and seemed to have no bottom.

The only animals were the snakes, lizards, and horned toads, which lay in the shadows of the rocks. High up in the clear sky now and then a buzzard or a hawk could be seen—the latter intent upon small prey, the former listlessly hovering as though anticipating the death of something larger.

The air was thick with the heat, and hot currents were plainly discernible as they rushed to the cooler strata above. There were breezes, but they felt as if the furnace gates of Hades had been opened for a moment to take in a lost soul.

The plan of our journey was to reach the first night a water-hole a score of miles from the edge of the desert. In view of the possibility of its being dry, the cask of water had been provided. From this point we were to drive on the morrow to another well five miles distant, where water was known to be unfailing. This was to be our camp and base of operations; in fact, it was a station laid down in the sketch-map in my client's possession.

At last the first day's destination was reached. The team was worn and jaded with the hot, hard work, the men in not much better condition. We all hurried to the little basin to draw some water for the horses. The bucket struck the hard, dry bottom with a hollow thud—there was no water there. The disappointment was sickening, even though we had provided against it. The only thing to be done, however, was to pitch a camp, deal out the water sparingly from the cask, and to push on in the cool of the dawn to the well beyond.

We were going about our preparations, when a loud exclamation from one of my companions drew us all three to the waggon to stare in dismay at the empty cask. By some dire mischance the bung had worked loose, and the precious fluid had been wasted on the thirsty sands. There had been less than half of it left when we had last quenched our thirsts and given our poor beasts a bucketful between them.

The accident was demoralising and foreshadowed hardship for the night, if not actual danger for the morrow. However, we made the best of it, and with dry throats and parched lips we finally dropped off to sleep, despite the whinneying of our thirsty animals. At the first glimpse of dawn we were up and away—one driving, the others walking—in the direction of the other well.

Under the conditions it was a question of hours—not miles. It seemed as if flesh and blood could never bear it. With faces burnt and blistered, feet galled, legs weary, throats drawn, lips cracked, and tongues swollen, we dragged ourselves along. The poor, panting horses, with drooping ears, would stop every few minutes to rest until they were goaded on. What reproaches can be read in a dumb brute's eye—reproaches that can never be answered!

At last, with the sun high up and blazing upon us we saw a few withered plants in the distance. As we approached, we could see that they were but dead stalks—ominous indications of drought. We drew nearer, and at last reached the hole from which we were to draw water—stale, flat, and hot, but water after all. Alas! No! The well was dry. Good God! Bereft of reason we threw ourselves down upon the rocks. How long the stupor of despair lasted I do not know.

I remember looking up to the sky—perhaps to pray—again I do not know—and there I saw a hovering buzzard. This, then, was to be the end! The awful suggestiveness of the presence of the carrion bird frightened me back from the apathy which had taken possession of my soul. I looked about me. My companions sat with their heads sunk upon their knees; the poor horses had lain down in their harness, still attached to the waggon.

The thought: "May not instinct be stronger than reason?" came to me like an inspiration. I walked over to the beasts, loosened the traces, took off the neck-yoke, and tied the lines to their collars. Instantly they both rose, and started slowly off towards a reef of rocks a couple of miles away. I looked at my crouching comrades; I spoke to them, but they did not reply. I snatched up a bucket and a canteen from the waggon, and started after the horses.

My recollection fails me here. I only know what I did from the result. I indistinctly remember seeing the horses disappear behind the rocks, and wishing that I could reach their shade, there to lie down and die. With this object in view I must have staggered on. Then came oblivion. My recollection of my return to conciousness begins with an impression of great comfort and of water—pure, clear water, and plenty of it, my face and hair dripping with it, my clothing drenched with it. What luxury! what delight! I remember opening my eyes and looking about.

The first object I saw was a goblin, a vile and horrid figure—a semblance of a man, with long, tangled, white hair and beard, a brown and wrinkled visage, and frightful eyes, the nails of feet and hands grown into long claws. Scattered about him were the skeletons of rats and snakes. This creature gesticulated and gibbered hideously at me.

"What delirium is this?" I thought. Then, glancing skyward, I saw the buzzard still hovering overhead. I remembered him, and then, as I grew more into myself again, I saw the horses standing near by; my bucket filled with water stood beside me. It was no dream; it was a verity; my life was saved.

I sprang to my feet. As I did so my hideous companion also rose and began a wild dance of joy about me.

"She sent you! She sent you!" he screamed. "Where is she?"

"Yes," I answered, for I now saw that I was dealing with a madman; "she sent me; we will go to her."

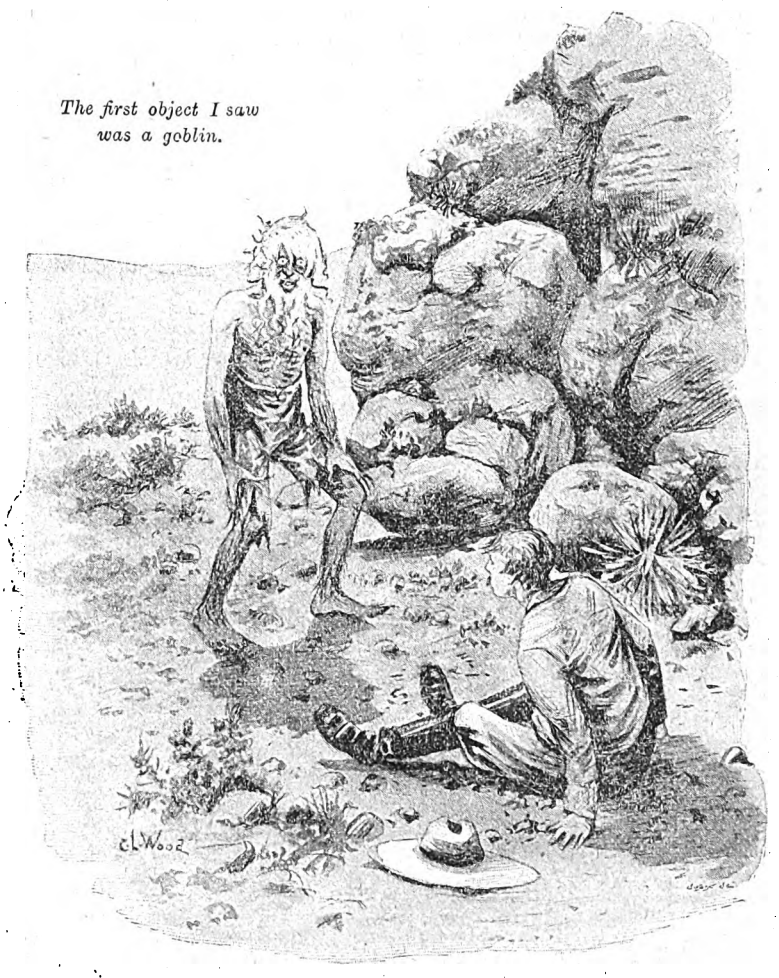
I went over to the horses, which were standing by a pool in the rock; it was evident that they had drunk their fill. I replenished the canteen which had been slung over my shoulder, jumped upon the back of one of the horses, and bade my stranger companion mount the other.

"Let us hurry," said I.

"To her?" he inquired.

"Yes," I answered. "Come, hurry."

We started on the back trail as rapidly as the heavy sand would permit. Fortunately, there had been no wind to obliterate the tracks, for had there been I should have had great difficulty in retracing my steps.



The first object I saw was a goblin.

After travelling, perhaps, a mile, the waggon could be seen in the distance. What was the fate of my companions? Were they still alive? Were they still where I had left them? Or had they wandered off as men do in that awful place when urged by the craze of thirst?

It was not long before I could see them. Their bodies lay prone upon the rocks. We reached them. Thank Heaven! they were still alive, but unconscious. A little water was poured between the swollen lips, their faces bathed with the precious liquid, and back, back they came from their years of purgatory.

It was not until the horses were once more hitched to the waggon, and we were about to start off in the direction of the water, that I found time to think of the mad stranger, who now began to clamour with the greatest violence, and pointed to the west with his skinny claws.

"To her! To her!" he shrieked.

It was then the memory of the dusty wayfarer of the past summer came to me.

"Yes, she is waiting for you," said I: "but first we must have water—and gold," I added cynically, half aloud.

His face lighted up with intelligence for a moment.

"Of course—the gold. I had forgotten the gold!" he exclaimed; "the beautiful red gold—and the diamonds—aye, the glorious stones. Yes, we will take them to her." He paused, then frantically screamed: "But they are not yours, they are mine—hers and mine!"

Here was a new phase in the situation—were we to fulfil our wild mission after all?

We had kept a chart of our journey so far, by prismatic compass and odometer. Our latitudes and departures were quickly calculated. Sure enough, we were in the vicinity of the point noted in the rough map. It was two miles further east—about the position of the water-hole.

The horses were jaded, but they knew that water was ahead, and they responded to a stronger urging than perhaps they would have received had not the allurement of fortune lain ahead.

We reached the water. We all threw ourselves upon the ground and drank, the horses pushing their muzzles beside us into the pool; and then we washed, drenching ourselves, clothes and all. After all, there was no thought of anything but drinking and eating and sleeping that night.

While we were opening some tins of food, the poor idiot darted from us; before we knew what he was about, we saw him returning with a snake which he had killed. Immediately he began tearing off the skin with his teeth. It was too evident how the poor creature had contrived to live. He had not been fed by the manna of heaven, but by the creeping things—symbols of the lost. And this from the thirst that knows no assuaging, the torture of lifetimes, the thirst for gold.

Early on the morrow our position was verified. It was as close as anything could be from so primitive a source as the dead man's sketch. Here—or near here—was the lost Peg-Leg Mine. "Now for the glittering gold," said we all. There was no indication of the likelihood of it. We were upon a little granitic island—a deep depression in which formed the life-giving reservoir—in the midst of a sea of sand.

"Where is the gold?" was eagerly demanded of our goblin host.

"Gold? Where? Are you blind?" he answered. "See!" And he gathered up the sand, letting it trickle through his fingers. "Gold for her; gold to buy the world; she will be a queen!" Darting back to the granite, he detached some crystals of tourmaline with his distorted claws. "See the gems!" he continued. "I will make her a crown from her own gold and her own gems," and thus he gibbered of wealth and the bonnie wife.

The horses were hitched up again, the cask filled and carefully stopped. To quiet our mad companion, a small sack was filled with sand, another with tourmaline, and we started slowly upon our homeward progress. It was a tedious, weary journey, and the sun pelted down upon us. But we knew that the next night would see us safe in the foothills, and we were thankful.

Our weird companion chattered ceaselessly. "Where is she? When shall I see her?" were his reiterated questions. "She is waiting over there," he said, once or twice, pointing out over the sand. To humour him we followed his direction, which did not take us from our path; for path there was none. Any straight line is a road from the desert; any destination out of it a haven of delight.

Late in the afternoon of the second day the madman exclaimed: "There she is!" and, before we could stop him, he had rushed frantically ahead of us, with a speed too great for us to follow. We saw in the distance a black object, which, as he approached it, rose high in the air, and hovered over him. It was the buzzard.

As we drew up to the spot from which it had flown, we found a skeleton partly covered by the sand; and there were bits of a woman's raiment.

The crazy man clasped the ghastly fragments in his arms.

"It is she!" he exclaimed. "She waited for me."

We tried to disengage him from the skeleton. He struggled for a moment, then ceased, but the fierce embrace was unrelaxed. We looked at him—he was dead. We glanced up involuntarily—the buzzard still hovered overhead.

A deep grave was dug in the sand; the two bodies were lowered into it, still locked together, and the bags of sand and tourmaline dropped beside them. We bade them a few sad words of farewell and shovelled back the sand.

From the HON. FREDERICK GALLOWAY to his elder brother, the HON. FRANCIS GALLOWAY.

Grand Pacific Hotel, Chicago,

DEAR FRANK,—It is ages since I have heard from you, but I suppose everything goes on as usual and that you can find nothing to write about. When I wrote last I told you of my engagement to Miss Josie Fairfield, only daughter and heiress of Jeremiah Fairfield; and I think I gave you a fair description of your future sister-in-law. Old Jeremiah is behaving very handsomely, and is going to plank down a fair share of his dollars in hard cash. I am in excellent condition, and, to use a favourite expression of my fiancée's, "am just having a lovely time."

Everybody here makes an awful fuss over me, and will insist on calling me "Lord Galloway." Titles here are held in the highest veneration; but the majority of the people I have met don't seem to know the difference between an Honourable and a Marquis. My future father-in-law took me over his pig-sticking establishment yesterday, and each time we came to a group of butchers at work he would stop them for an instant and say: "This is Lord Galloway, my future son-in-law."

There is one curious mistake that everyone has made here, and that is, that they have all taken it for granted that I am the eldest son, and heir to the title, although I have never done or said anything to cause them to believe so. As old Fairfield has already told all his friends that I shall be Viscount Decateur, and consequently his daughter a Viscountess, I hardly dare now to undeceive him, in case he should want to break off the match. My fair fiancée also has told all her girl friends that on the death of my father she will be Viscountess Decateur; so that I really see nothing for it but to leave them in ignorance of the true state of the case until after the wedding, which has been fixed for this day week. Consequently, when you receive this, my proverbial ill-luck will have deserted me, and I shall be the happy possessor of a millionaire bride.

I am sincerely attached to Miss Fairfield; but as I told you in my last letter, my father-in-law elect, as they say over here, is the worst specimen of a low-bred Yankee that I have ever set eyes on.—Your affectionate brother,

FRED.

May 12th, 1888.

DEAR FRANK,—The affair went off splendidly, and without a hitch. All the Chicago papers teemed with accounts of the brilliant ceremony, and the magnificent presents made to the bride. Unfortunately, they all accepted it as a fact that I am the future Lord Decateur, and I have not yet had the courage to undeceive my bride. As we sail for England next week, I shall not say anything about the mistake, but will leave it until she meets you, and finds out that you are the heir, and not myself. One paper in Chicago asserted that I should soon be a Duke, as my father, the Duke of Decateur, was in a very precarious state of health. That was a good stretch of imagination for a Chicago journalist. Good-bye, old fellow.—Your affectionate brother,

FRED.

DEAR PA,—I am writing to you with a broken heart. I have been the victim of a most shameful imposture, and I am the miserable, unhappy wife of the vilest of scoundrels. My husband is not Lord Galloway. He will never be a Viscount! He will never own Decateur Castle! He will never sit in the House of Lords! But he will always be a miserable, sneaking, pauper younger son! How could you let me marry him without finding out all about him! Your carelessness—ignorance, I may in charity call it—has ruined your daughter's life and wrecked her prospects for ever. I am coming home immediately; for I will never live with the wretched impostor who gained my affections under false pretences. I dare not face the girls in Chicago; so meet me in New York and advise me what to do.—I sail on the Umbria next Saturday. Your broken-hearted daughter,

JOSIE.

FAIRFIELD."

From MESSRS. RUDGE, FUDGE, STUDGE, TWENTYPEST AND RUDGE, Solicitors, to the HON. FREDERICK GALLOWAY.

300, Lincoln's Inn Fields, July 30th, 1888.

DEAR SIR,—We have received the copy of the Chicago Tribune forwarded to us by you, and have made inquiries as to whether the advertisement to which you directed our attention is, in America, a legal service of notice of suit for divorce. We find as follows:

That in the State of Illinois, in which State Chicago is situated, in cases of non-residence, uncertainty of respondent's whereabouts, or living out of the jurisdiction of the United States, publication of notice of suit in a county newspaper for a period of four weeks is sufficient and good legal service. We have also ascertained that in the event of no notice of defence being put in, judgment would go by default.

In regard to your other questions, we are not sufficiently acquainted with the divorce laws of America to advise, but we have always heard that divorces would be obtained in Chicago on almost any plea. We would recommend you to write at once to a resident lawyer in the town where the suit has been instituted, or to go there yourself at once.—Yours faithfully,

RUDGE, FUDGE, AND CO.

From the HON. FREDERICK GALLOWAY to his brother, the HON. FRANCIS GALLOWAY.

Grand Pacific Hotel, Chicago,

DEAR FRANK,—The agony is over. Yesterday the court, in response to the demand of my late bride, annulled the marriage which had taken place between us. The annulment was granted on the ground that the petitioner's consent to the marriage had been obtained by fraud and false representation on my part. Numerous witnesses swore that I had called myself "Lord" Galloway and had stated that I was heir to Viscount Decateur. Of course, my word was no good against all this. Old Fairfield, who gave evidence, described me as "damaged goods," and the judge paid no attention to me.

Indeed, I was told beforehand that the judge was sure to grant the plaintiff's petition. The fact is, this worthy is a candidate for a vacant judgeship in the Court of Appeal, and did not dare to run the risk of losing old Fairfield's influence. Judges over here are elected by popular vote; and old Fairfield, besides having the influence which is always attendant on great wealth, employs thousands of men in his pig-sticking establishment, and of course controls their voices. Thus it is said that no judge who aspires to a higher office or even to re-election, ever dares to say him nay. Moreover, I am told that this old hog-butcher's political influence is so great that he controls half the State Legislature, and can get any bills he likes passed by it; and that if the judge had refused to annul my marriage with his daughter, he would have had a special Act declaring it null and void put through the Legislature.

Although unquestionably it was very wrong to allow these toadies and title-worshippers to continue in their self-created delusion that I was the eldest son, yet I certainly had nothing to do with originating that belief. That was simply the offspring of a combination of ignorance and sycophancy.

I am going to remain here for a few weeks, as I have gone into a little wheat speculation which I hope may prove remunerative. If it fails, I shall be, as they say here, "dead broke."—Your affectionate brother,

FRED.

From JEREMIAH FAIRFIELD TO LORD DECATEUR.

400, Drexel Boulevard, Chicago,

MY LORD,—I red with the deapest regret of the terible calamity which has overtook you, and I hurry to offer you my condolations. My daughter is real sick with grief, and says as she just longs to be by your side in your trubble. Now, my lord, I am willing to say, "Let bigones be bigones," and let us patch up this little matter. No one is to blame but I, for it was I as forced Josie to throw you up. I seperatted two loving harts, and am real sorry. Shall Josie come to you? there is nothing like simpathy in trubble. If you and Josie will make it up, I will come down handsome. The ceremony could be performed quiet in my house or at your hotel; although so far as ceremony is consarned, I think marriages are made in heaven, and no earthly jedge has a right to unmake them. My daughter sends her love, and says as she and I will come round to see you this evening. I trust your lordshipp will receive us with the same forgivvin spirit with wich we come. I remain, my lord, yours for ever.

JEREMIAH FAIRFIELD.

Letter from the VISCOUNT DECATEUR to JEREMIAH FAIRFIELD.

Grand Pacific Hotel, Chicago,
Oct. 12th, 1888.

SIR,—I have just waded through your imbecile epistle, and am now thanking God that your daughter's ignorance and narrow-minded ambition has saved me from being cursed with a father-in-law who is capable of producing such a document. I regret that it is not convenient to me to agree with you in your newly-formed opinion that marriages are made in heaven. I would also advise you that as your daughter will henceforth be branded in the English matrimonial market as—using an expression which you once applied to me as well as to the pork with which you feed the public—"damaged goods," you will be wise to try to dispose of her elsewhere.

In conclusion I notify you that I am wearing a pair of heavy shooting-boots, and that I think it would be as well for you not to come to see me. I leave for England to-night.—Yours,

DECATEUR.

LASCA.

IT was not in the Quartier Latin, but next door to it, and everyone knows just where it is, too. Quarante-cinq, Rue La Grande—why "La Grande," nobody did know. The street was narrow, the houses high. One higher than the rest frowned down upon them. This was the one that had Jean Boullé's bake-shop. Perhaps because Jean's buns were good and two for cinq sous, perhaps because the top of the house had a skylight, M'sieur lived there.

Who was M'sieur? Ciel! how do I know?

He was a painter named Heywood, but everybody called him "M'sieur," that's all I know.

Who am I? I might say I don't know that either. One changes every seven years, and I am seven times seven. I'm another painter, and I was—but this story is not about me, but M'sieur and Mademoiselle Fetherston and—Lasca.

I had half of M'sieur's studio and painted every day. We had often the same models.

M'sieur was tall, and strong, and dark; English, very English.

Most Englishmen have no atmosphere. They cannot paint; they have nothing dainty. But M'sieur could paint. He had travelled much; Europe, Africa, America, all he painted. I have travelled, too, when I saw M'sieur's pictures. They made one feel the places. One day I came to the studio and found M'sieur painting at a strange picture.

Miss Fetherston—Dieu! the names these Americans have—sat near, modelling. She was a pupil of M'sieur's learning to sculp. How? You say not "to sculp"? What then? "Sculpture." Ah; peste! on the first Englishman. French is civilised, why cannot all speak it?

But M'sieur's picture? It was a large canvas, a stretch of dull brown prairie with long wavering grass. A herd of fierce cattle was in the distance, their leader tossing his horns madly. A dark black cloud overhung the blue sky. In the foreground was a pony, what you call him, mustard? No, mustang. A man was in the saddle, and a woman's form was dimly outlined as if she were about to spring behind the man. That was all. It was only roughly sketched in, but there was something odd about the picture. There was power in every hurried stroke of the brush, a subtle undercurrent that filled you with a fierce, wild longing for freedom.

Just as I entered the room that June day, M'sieur flung down his brush.

"I'll never do it!" he said impatiently.

"What makes you?" I asked, laying my hand on his shoulder. M'sieur and I were good friends—then.

"Ah! you!" he said, turning his head. He had been too absorbed to see me when I entered. He continued: "I can never paint this picture; I cannot find a model for Lasca."

"What is it?" I asked. "There is a story to it?"

"Yes," he answered, "a Texas story, of the Great Norther, a wind storm they have over there. The cattle flee from it and any one caught before them is trampled to death. The only chance for life is to shoot your horse, get under his body, and let the herd dash over you. The story is of a Texan ranger and his sweetheart; how they fled before the storm and cattle, how the mustang fell, and the girl flung herself on her lover's breast, dying to save him." M'sieur's eyes had kindled as he spoke, and his face flushed. "There's a poem about it," he added, "and my picture is where it says:

> "Was that thunder? I grasped the cord
> Of my swift mustang without a word;
> I sprang to the saddle, she swung behind—
> Away! for a hot chase down the wind."

"Bon!" I cried. M'sieur had a way with him, un attrait; what you say? "Charm." He interested everyone.

"But! why cannot you paint it?" I asked.

He flung back a lock of curly hair which always tumbled into his eyes, and frowned.

"I cannot get a model for the girl. 'Lasca,' her name is, and she's an ideal. All love and self-sacrifice for the man she loved, and no 'patient Griselda' business either; plenty of fire and temper."

"Ma foi! M'sieur, one would think you could find 'fire and temper' enough in the Latin quarter." I laughed. M'sieur frowned deeper, and shook his head.

"I don't want that kind of fire. It burns out. This woman loved à la mort. If I could find her"—he stopped abruptly, as a voice said:

"Perhaps M'sieur would try me?"

Both of us turned quickly, and saw such a tiny little figure. Slight she was, yet somehow not thin—the curves were too beautiful rounded to give any impression of bones. A cloud of hair, real cendré, that shade between chestnut and golden which we French admire more than your taffy English locks; dark, straight brows; a pair of grey-blue eyes, fringed with black; a pale skin; full red lips, which drooped at the corner; all this we saw as she stood before us.

"Who are you?" demanded M'sieur.

"Lasca, if M'sieur will," she said demurely.

"Child," he said impatiently, "you can't pose for Lasca. She was dark and wild and fierce almost. No blonde women have any 'go' in them."

"Have they not, M'sieur?" There was a mocking ring in her voice. Her eyes had a strange little expression. "M'sieur knows, sans doute," she added, "but perhaps M'sieur would show me the pose he wants."

He pulled down an old Mexican bridle, fastened it to a post, and said:

"The man is mounted. Grab the bridle, put one foot on his toe, and start to swing to the saddle. Jove!" he exclaimed, "that's it exactly."

The child—she seemed scarcely more than that—flung her lithe body into the very position. There was something startling in her tense pose. Then: "Will I do, M'sieur?" she asked inquiringly.

"Do? I should think you would," he said. "What's your name?" he asked again.

"Lasca," she answered coolly.

With a shrug he began to paint.

That commenced it. Every day she came and posed, an old woman waiting for her in the corner like a dragon. Heywood painted fast and steadily.

"I'm afraid she'll disappear in a flash as she came," he said.

Miss Fetherston also came each day for lessons. It seemed to me she taught as well as learnt.

M'sieur often asked her questions, and she gave advice freely. She was tall and dark. I thought her cold and like her own statues. But M'sieur—well, M'sieur had a theory that dark women were worth winning and blondes were cold. A man with a theory has no eyes.

The winter passed, and the new model came and stayed. I painted hard, too, for the Salon came soon, and I was ambitious—then.

One day Miss Fetherston had a red rose in her gown, and M'sieur said 'twas like those in her cheeks. She looked at him in her slow, sleepy way and smiled. I glanced at Lasca, and saw—but I dared not think what I saw, for, in an instant, she too smiled, a strange little smile.

The studio was full of trash. Old armour, draperies, Oriental stuffs, half-finished pictures, sketches, bits of furniture, all were crowded together into a mélange.

Miss Fetherston sat in a high-backed chair, resting. Lasca—we knew no other name for her—was curled on a divan, her strange little face in curious contrast to the brilliant hues in which she was draped. I was smoking—that goes without saying. Heywood was talking his theory—that also goes without saying.

"There never was a blonde woman with any 'go' in her," he repeated for the hundredth time.

Miss Fetherston smiled well pleased; Lasca sat up.

"That depends upon where one is to go and with whom," she said.

"Does it, petite?" M'sieur always treated the little waif like a child.

"What would you do for the man you loved?" he asked.

"Die," she said laconically.

"That wouldn't do him a great amount of good," said Miss Fetherston.

Lasca's eyes flashed and she bit her lip.

"It might," was all she said.

Then M'sieur spoke.

"Lasca, could you be jealous?" he said.

"Perhaps, M'sieur," she replied. "Why?"

"There's another picture I'd like you to pose for: the Texan said he made her 'jealous for fun,' and in a flash she drew her dagger on him. Can you try it?"

M'sieur always said no model could pose really well unless she felt the meaning of the picture. That was another of his theories.

Lasca sprang up, saying: "I can try, M'sieur," as she draped the Mexican serape round her, tied a brilliant sash about her waist, and thrust a jewelled dagger in her girdle.

As she started to pose, Miss Fetherston came near her.

"You have it not right," she said, as she gave the serape a pull. Just then, M'sieur, too, arranged the drapery. His hand touched hers. A look passed between them.

Lasca saw. Like a flash she drew the dagger, her eyes black with anger, her expression fierce; then she caught herself up quickly.

"Lasca! What acting!" cried M'sieur. "Your pose, your expression was perfect!"

"Thank you, M'sieur," she said in a subdued voice. She was very pale. She caught my eye.

"I do not like women," she said in apology. "I like them not to touch me."

Miss Fetherston shrugged her shoulders and looked amused.

M'sieur painted. Artists may have an eye for colour but they see not other things.

The winter was gone and the spring came. It was beautiful in Paris. Everything seemed new again after all the cold and the dark of the winter.

My Salon picture was accepted and well hung. And M'sieur? His picture of Lasca was a "Médaille," and everybody talked of it. Such atmosphere, such masterly handling of a difficult subject! Such a wonderful model, a pose so natural and spirited! These were the favourable criticisms, and M'sieur was the envy of us all.

We were young then. It's a wonderful thing to be young. It means so much: life and light and—Lasca.

One day M'sieur said to Lasca:

"You've made me famous, petite."

She smiled radiantly.

"Will you pose again?" he asked.

"When M'sieur wishes," she said, her eyelids down.

"Thank you, bonne petite," and he laid his hand carelessly on her hair.

The little proud head drooped.

"For whom else do you pose?" he asked suddenly.

"M'sieur, for no one," she said quickly.

"Non?" He was surprised. "Have you plenty of money, child?" abruptly.

"M'sieur!" the one word said a volume of indignation.

"I beg your pardon," he said, and Lasca went swiftly away. I had noticed the old hag who came with her always pocketed the daily fee that Heywood gave to Lasca.

"She doesn't seem like a grisette. I wonder who she is?" said M'sieur. It was his first remark about her. She was "only a model" to him. As for me, I was not always old; I could see beyond my palette, and I had no theories.

The next day Miss Fetherston took a holiday. She was gone two weeks. Dieu! what a fortnight. Lasca was a different creature. Even M'sieur looked surprised. He never again said "blonde women are tiresome."

Lasca was happy. She expanded before our very eyes, as a rose yields to the sun, till its pure heart lies wide open to the bold fellow's gaze. Ah! Lasca! little pure heart, little Southern rose, where are you now?

One day, it was June, a bright, glorious, sunny June, such as we had when I was young—Junes seem old and cold now. She was especially gay, and her merry sallies kept us both in shouts of laughter. It was better laughter than one hears always near the Quartier Latin. Finally, painting at an end, she flung her tiny form down on the big couch in which she seemed lost. One little foot tapped the floor, such a dainty foot with its high-arched instep. Her hair was pushed loosely back, her sweet eyes were dark, her cheeks flushed and brilliant. She was laughing at M'sieur for some awkward move he had made with his maul-stick, when the door opened.

"A letter for M'sieur," a voice said.

Heywood's face changed. He took the letter, and opening it, read eagerly.

Lasca watched him, and I—I watched Lasca. Her face changed, too. As the sunset glow passes from the sky when night comes, all the pretty colour faded from her cheeks. Then M'sieur spoke like a big schoolboy planning a holiday. These English are canaille, I think.

"No more painting to-day! Old man, congratulate me. Lasca, I must tell you something. Miss Fetherston has promised to marry me. She is coming back to-morrow."

I glanced at Lasca. She was white to the lips, but struggling bravely for self-command. I spoke hastily.

"I congratulate you, vraiment! M'sieur, and Mademoiselle as well," talking on as best I could.

Then Lasca spoke: "And, M'sieur, I wish you joy—and Mademoiselle." There was a catch in her voice but she coughed and hid it. "M'sieur will not need me to-day? Au revoir," and she glided out of the room.

The next day she came not. Miss Fetherston was there, calm, stately and looking beautiful. She took as a matter of course M'sieur's homage which, like all Englishmen when in love, he lavished freely.

Les Américaines are strange women!

Again, the next day Lasca came not. M'sieur chafed. He wished to paint. Love is sweet but Art is Master. The third day she came, so white, so fragile, the cruel, black shadows under the great grey eyes.

"M'sieur will pardon, I was ill," she said deprecatingly to Heywood's somewhat surly greeting. An artist when he is crossed is truly a spoiled child. Lasca posed again and Mademoiselle Fetherston criticised rather freely.

"You have not wished me joy yet," she said to Lasca one day.

Lasca's eyes flashed peculiarly.

"I wished it to M'sieur," she said; "if you love him you prefer he should have it."

"You are a strange child," said Mademoiselle.

Two weeks more, and then came the wedding. The bride and groom were to go to Normandy for a month's holiday.

"After that, I want you to pose again, Lasca," said M'sieur, the day before the wedding.

"Yes, M'sieur?" Lasca's voice had the pretty inflection of a question.

"Yes, petite," he said, "you're the best model I ever had. Good-bye," and he held out his hand.

She raised her poor little white face, and looked at him once, a long, long look.

"Good-bye," she said, and stooping swiftly she kissed his hand—once—twice—thrice—then, skimming like a bird on the wing, was gone from the room.

M'sieur rubbed his hand on his velvet jacket and looked foolish.

"Jove! What a tempest," he said.

"Blonde women have no 'go,'" I said drily.

The next day was the wedding. At Notre Dame the Mass was, and I went. The church was crowded, though few noticed the quiet ceremony. M'sieur and Miss Fetherston were too taken up with themselves to see the wee white face I saw in the crowd.

The Mass was over, and M'sieur and his bride turned to leave the church.

What was that noise? A roar as if from wild beasts, and in an instant all was confusion.

"Socialists," was the cry. "Vallinski and his Twelve!" Women screamed and fainted. Men fought their way to the door. Blows resounded. Oaths were heard.

I looked for Lasca, and caught a glimpse of her close to M'sieur. I pushed to his tall form as he struggled to the great door. He was supporting his wife, and was pale with anger, she with fright.

"Down with priests and their worshippers!" cried the Socialists. One remembered the Commune, and the twenty-second of May.

Then came the police, and the fight became fiercer. I saw Heywood strike a man a heavy blow, exclaiming: "Keep off the lady, can't you?"

The wretch uttered a frightful oath, and cried: "Sacré bleu! I can, but I will not!"

An instant, there was a gleam of steel, a flash, a woman's fearful shriek of agony, and I could see no more. I forced my way to them and reached M'sieur just as he stepped through the portico. He was carrying something in his arms. His wife was hurt, then? He kneeled in the porch supporting on his knees—Mon Dieu!—Lasca!

The tumult was stilled, and the police had control. Madame Heywood knelt beside her husband. Lasca, cold and still, lay in his arms.

"Is she dead?" I asked faintly.

She opened her eyes and saw nothing but the face bending over her. She smiled a smile of perfect bliss.

"How did it happen?" I whispered.

In choked tones, Madame Heywood answered: "A man drew his dagger and tried to kill me. She flung herself between. He stabbed her."

Then Lasca spoke feebly, for the blood came in great gushes from the wound in her breast.

"I saved her for you," she gasped. "I told you I could die for him! I always loved you. Will you kiss me just once?"

M'sieur bent his head and pressed his lips to hers, Lasca raised a tiny white hand and patted his cheek feebly.

"It is very sweet—to—die—for—you," she murmured, and, with that perfect smile upon her lips, she died.

The journal next day had a small notice.

"A number of Socialists, headed by Vallinski, a Pole, broke into the church of Notre Dame yesterday and came to blows with the worshippers. Doubiuska Vallinski, the young daughter of the ring-leader, was fatally stabbed."

Or, THE ROMANCE OF A LOST CONTINENT.

By GEO. C. WALLIS, Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," etc.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE BATTLE OF THE SHIPS.

ON the even following the morn when the fleet was ready to set sail—for I deferred the start until next day, that we might have less distance to traverse and so be fresher to meet the oncoming foe—I lingered in that fair garden long after the rosy sunset had died away, listlessly pacing amongst its bowers and tree-arched avenues, hoping against hope that Briseis would meet me there before I went away to do battle for her and her crown. The moon rose, though obscured at intervals by light, drifting clouds, and her pale beams cast weird, fantastic shadows on the mossy slopes and pebbly paths which I perambulated aimlessly. A cooling zephyr, scent-laden, came rustling through the drooping leaves of the tall trees, playing on my brow with the most delicious chilliness, and sighing away amid the shrubs and flowers on its course to the city with a soft, subdued, and soothing monody. Calmed somewhat by its pleasing gentleness I turned my steps towards the rustic seat in the old familiar grove, and sat there, lulled by the stilly sounds into a thoughtful reverie.

Not long had I sat there, when a different noise struck on my ear, and my heart leaped in expectation as I peered down that ghostly arcade of bending boughs and shifting shadows, seeing presently a form in white stepping softly on the darkened path. It came nearer, first haltingly, as though afraid, and then, when I sprang forward into the light of a lunar ray, more quickly and confidentially. It was Briseis, my Queen, my love! With fevered haste I stretched out my arms to take her to my embrace, but gently, yet firmly, she motioned me aside, and bidding me sit where she could see my face, took seat in a shadow, though not an arm's length from me. Fearing, I was silent, nonplussed by her sudden coldness, and she was the first to break the stillness with her silvery speech.

"I am here, Arnon, as I hinted to thee in the palace, wishing to see thee before thou goest away to do battle for me."

"Now thou has come, I am indeed repaid, my Queen, for the hours of watching and waiting that I have done for thee," I said, striving once more to seize her hands.

"It may not be, Arnon," said she, repulsing me, still with gentleness; "it may not be until thou hast explained to me some things that I will ask."

"Ask on," I answered, my self-assurance oozing fast.

"Thou wilt know what I desire thee to tell," said the Queen, "when I say that many rumours have reached me that thou art one and the same with that adventurer who named himself Macis, who lived at the palace of the Princess of Aidè, the wanton Listra, and was her paramour for more than a year."

"Who has set this tale afloat?" I asked angrily, immediately suspecting my two comrades, and forgetting how easily it might have reached Kronos otherwise.

"Nay, think not to deny it, Arnon; 'tis no lying report, but a true story, for there are those in the city now who lived at Thinæ when thou wast under the syren's spell, who came here when I sent to raise an army in that province. Seeing thee here, these nobles and soldiers have not scrupled to noise abroad thy former doings, and, also, thy followers have been recognised."

I groaned aloud, seeing that the black truth was out and there was now no escape from it.

"Groan not yet, Arnon," went on Briseis, "I have more to say. I might forgive thee even such a great apostacy as this, knowing the deepness of Listra's wiles and the power of her wicked charms, and also that it is said she was thy willing leman, even beseeching thee to love her, but she is not the only fair one thou hast had since I bade thee farewell so long ago. Who was she who was 'so dear to thee,' who sailed with thee on the eastern seas, now nigh three years agone?"

"What! knowest of Vesta, too?"

"I knew not her name, but only of her," continued my interrogator, with pain in her voice now, "through a troublesome pirate called Thaska, who was captured by a warship soon after he had spoken your vessel. They brought him to me—for, seeking news of thee, I questioned every sea-robber who fell into my sailors' clutches—and he told how he had chased in vain a full-rigged pleasure ship far out on the eastern waters, and that from her deck thou defied him to a trial of speed, fearing to give him battle because of one on board 'who was dear to thee.' Say, was she a wanton, like Listra?"

"Far from it," I said. "One more like thy own pure self than that; one who now sleeps in the Shadows beyond, at peace. But tell me, what didst do with Thaska?"

"I let him go again, because he brought me tidings that thou wert still living," said Briseis, beginning, I thought, to relent. "And now, my Arnon, tell me, as briefly as may be, the story of thy wanderings, hiding nothing for fear or shame."

So I told her how the world had used me in those fourteen years; how I came nigh to death in the trackless Nubian forests; how I fared in the Land of Khem, saving Vesta from the leopard, seeing the shape of Isis, discovering the plot against the life of King Menophres and coming into possession of my famous sword, and, through thinking my listener false, through Sothi's words, I had married Vesta and lived in peace for twice five years and then fled from the land through Itaska's jealousy; how we were wrecked in the Seamew and how Vesta perished of thirst on the open sea, leaving me alone to be cast up by the fickle waves near the secret treasure-hoard. And as I talked, growing grave or gay as memory responded to my call, Briseis drew nearer to me, till our hands met, just as they had done when we twain nestled there before—it seemed but yesterday—and ever she kept her gaze upon my face with breathless interest. When I told of Vesta's death, I felt her hand clasp mine in a shudder of sorrow and sympathy, and the solitary ray of moonlight that now shone upon us both showed glistening tear-drops trembling in her swimming eyes.

"Pray tell me further, Arnon," she said, "for I forgive thee fully so far. Had been more than mortal to have done otherwise in a far and foreign land."

Then I went on to relate my meeting with one-eared Vichri and the lying tale he told me, showing how, through believing it, I had fallen an easy prey to the captivating graces of unscrupulous Listra. "Though now," I said, "that I have been fooled, I hate her more than my worst foe."

"Then I must forgive thee all, my weak-heart, it seems to me," said the Queen, "for surely thou hadst good cause for all thy misdeeds, and ill deserve that I turn cold at last! Yet 'tis hard to know thee sullied by an impure love, and 'tis hard to quench the fire of jealousy that hath burned within me since these things came to my knowledge."

"And 'twas hard for me to think thee false," I said, "to toss in sleeplessness at nights, and rack my brain for answer to the puzzle in the day, and ever to carry the load of that thought of pain with me, in good luck or ill. 'Twas hard indeed; but amply I am repaid now that the cloud is lifted.

"But tell me," I continued, "how Sothi came to know my real character, and so impose that dreadful tale on me?"

"Would that I had learned the truth before my cousin—base ingratiate—could have used the King as his instrument, or Sothi could have put his project into execution," said Briseis. "Every hand but mine was against thee, then, who art now so honoured and favoured."

"'Tis wealth and fame that alone are honoured," I said bitterly, "in the world's eyes. But did this one-eared cousin lie to me in that particular also? Was't he who helped me into exile?"

"'Twas he, indeed," murmured the Queen; "but I will tell thee the foul story as I discovered it some years ago. My cousin Vichri came home from Ulmeca when you had gone on your treasure-hunt some weeks, and knowing that I should most likely be chosen to ascend the throne at the death of the old King, who was without issue, offered wedlock to me—though it may be that he loved me for myself as far as he can love anything. I need not give my answer to thee, Arnon. Then, raging inwardly, and outwardly morose, he came by chance into the society of Sothi, whom you had defeated so pitilessly at his favourite art of swordplay, and unknown to me they went to the King, obtaining his seal for thy outlawry. How the vanquished swordsman brought that about thou knowest, but not how they gained news of thy name. Dost remember that twice as we sat here and our love was told, there was a gentle rustling sound behind the shrubs?"

Like a sudden flash of light through the mist of a murky day, the remembrance of that sound came back to me. I had not heeded it then.

"Yes, I recall it well, now thou hast spoken, my Queen," I answered moodily, looking into the darkness.

"It was a slave, Arnon, a black slave whom I had punished the day before for eavesdropping, and who thus revenged himself on me by dogging my steps and overhearing our secret. This he cherished in his evil heart till Vichri came, when, seeing his chagrin and guessing the reason, he told the news to him. This, together with the knowledge that you dared to love me, and was more fortunate than himself, was the last provocation that Vichri needed. Being my cousin I could not punish him openly when I was made queen, nor Sothi, for reasons I have said, and also, until the death of this slave, who confessed his guilt to me at the bidding of the priest of Life, I did not know the whole story."

"And what of that slave?" I asked.

"I let him die in peace," said Briseis, ever merciful, "seeing that the spirits will so soon pass their verdict upon him. But when Vichri re-urged his suit when I was queen, I told him what I knew, sending him from my presence with scorn and sharp-stinging words, bidding him not to show his face again in Kronos. From that moment he has hated me, and for that reason has now gone to Ulmeca, there to assist the recreant Quitzaal, and doubtless this will explain why Sothi gave up Miropis to the enemy. And as the last drop in the cupful of his wickedness, Vichri must tell thee lying tales of me and send thee to the arms of a wanton, one whose charms were not strange to him, and only discarded because the novelty had worn off his passion."

"By Neith, Mant, and Nepthys!" I cried in Egyptian, the hot blood rushing to my face with fiery indignation, "by all the evil spirits of Amenti and the Shadow-Land" (relapsing into Atlantian again), "I knew not that till now. Gods and Spirits! but 'tis more than a man may bear! Have pity on me, Briseis, who art so pure and far above me that I scarce dare touch thee with these polluted hands!"

"When have I not had pity on thee; when not in all these years yearned to look on thee and tell thee that through all I have been true?" breathed Briseis, all gentleness and compassion now, from her sweet heart outwards. "Say that, through all, my Arnon, thou, too, hast thought of me."

"Ever, my pure love," I replied, "saving when the thought that thou wert lost to me for ever dimmed my reason and unhinged my mind. Saving then I have been true to thee, and from now will be so ever, cherishing and loving thee, and whether thou will it or no, watching over thee through joy or sorrow, to life's far end."

"Dearest, most deserving of men!" cried Briseis, yielding herself to my long-delayed and passionate embrace with a sigh of content, "I cannot deny thee longer, who hast waited such a weary time for our re-union. I cannot resist thee, steel my heart against thee as I may. Our souls were only meant each for the other, so take me, Arnon my love, both body and spirit, to be thy own from now henceforth!"

"My own sweet one!" I murmured gently, almost overcome by the sudden weight of gladness and the thrill of love's supremest joy. And when our lips met in the kiss that sealed the sacred compact, the kiss so long deferred, so sweetly given by my lovely dear whose form was Beauty's self, all count of time and sense of space fled from me, the darkness and the straggling moonlight was as though it were not. We were no longer sovereign and subject, but made equal by love's all-levelling forgetfulness, and in the overpowering blissfulness of that enraptured moment, one thought, one feeling alone, was tangible within my mind, and that was—Briseis, my love, my queen.

Presently, when the first flush of our joy was past, and we were able to talk, as rational beings, of other things, Briseis asked if I sailed on the morrow.

"Yes," I said, "unless, dear heart, you desire it otherwise."

"Nay, my Iron-fingers—as once before I called thee—I desire that you go as soon as can be, that you be the sooner back," said she, "for it is not seemly for a queen to wed a mere adventurer, who is known to be fresh from the arms of a careless woman; whereas, if you come back to Kronos as a great and victorious general, the saviour of your country, and wealthy, too, it will seem a fit and proper thing. For myself, thou knowest I care not for these quibbles, but a queen is not as other women."

"Art grave beyond thy years, my love," I answered; "but your advice is sound, and it shall be as you say. I will not return till every foe to Atlantis has fought his last."

"And then, my Arnon," said Briseis, "come to me and claim me for thy own, and thou shalt be my lord and King."

A little longer we stayed in that leafy avenue, and then, at the dictates of prudence, parted for the night, though I remained awhile, watching the flutter of her white robe adown the flower-bordered path, and the gleams of light upon her snowy coif, as far as my gaze could follow. Then I sought my couch to snatch an hour of needed sleep before the morrow's sun should rise and the morrow's task be entered on.

When the first streaks of red appeared in the east, I was afoot, and, rousing my comrades, proceeded to the bay, and soon stood on the deck of the doughty Ravager, which, with new-painted hull, taut sails, and fresh timbers where the old planks had rotted, warped out bravely to the middle of the harbour, and carried me on a visit of inspection round the huge fleet, now waking into active life. Canvas was unfurled, spars swung out, helms unbraced, and all was ready, when, at the mast of our low-hulled craft, now under her full spread of snow-white wings, I ran up the signal to weigh anchors and stand out to sea, tacking to the westward near the shore in two divisions.

By now the sun had fairly risen, and the great quays and wharves of Kronos were alive with the cheering populace, calling adieu to their friends on board and invoking the help of the Spirits for our task; and as the vast fleet swept out of the bay, rounding the beacon point, I saw the light and graceful cariole of the Queen, drawn by a pair of jet black steeds, dash round the harbour curve and out upon the promontory rock that guards the entrance, and of which all the ships, excepting my own, were by this time clear. As the Ravager, keeping in the rear to mark the stragglers, if any, shot grandly past the point, her prow cutting through the surf with a hissing music that was sweet in my ears, the royal cariole drew up at the very verge of the stone sea-wall, and Briseis herself, standing proudly erect in the light conveyance, waved her hand to me over the rapidly widening gulf of sea and spray.

I spun "Sunderer" high in the air in answering signal, catching it by the hilt as it fell, the newly-ground and polished blade gleaming white in the sun-rays, and at the sight of their lovely Queen a mighty cheer arose from that giant armament in one vast roaring wave of sound. Then, under the rising gale, we drew away, and presently all objects near the city were indistinguishable from our decks.

Now, giving the Ravager her full press of canvas, I flew forward, heading the labouring squadrons in splendid style, and pursued my way about a cable's length in front of the foremost line, in keen look-out for the expected foe.

Till evening the sea ahead was unbroken by a single sail, and all through the day we coasted along the shore with a favouring breeze, having full view, as we went, of the little fishing hamlets and littoral towns, half hidden in the dense copses of cedar, sycamore, olive, myrtle, and acacia trees, which, occurring in pleasing alternation, extended their territory into the ocean, whose salt waves lapped their outmost trunks with ominous familiarity. So close sometimes we sailed to the shore that we caught glimpses of the women water-carriers of the villages, bearing the earthen jars upon their heads with native grace, and walking with that upright carriage that their humble lot alone can give, their bare arms swinging as they went. Later on we sheered off into deeper water for safety as the darkness drew on, and the land then sunk to a low black ridge to northward.

I despaired of meeting the enemy that day, and was thinking, as I watched the red ball of the sun sinking into the west, and throwing his beams in a dazzling path of sparkling gold from the horizon to the Ravager's prow, that I would hoist the signal to drop anchors for the night, when a joyful shout rang out from the mast-tops of a dozen vessels: "The fleet in sight! Sails low down on the westward bow!" Straining my eyes I waited, and presently a black dot and then another, and then a score in quick succession, passed before the half-hidden disc of the sun flaring fiery as he hovered 'twixt day and night, and then as we swept on, scores upon scores of other sails and spars, and lastly hulls, crowding together and tacking towards us, coming up against us out of the portals of the sunset, six hundred strong.

"Put on full sail and stir up the rowers to their hardest," I cried, "and signal to grapple with the foe without delay!"

"But 'tis eve, and the sun has set now!" gasped Orlanis, the mate; "wilt not put off the action till dawn?"

"Who is captain here?" I asked shortly. "We shall attack them now! 'Twill be a moonlight night, and before long there will be plenty of lamps in yonder fleet. Also, the wind is now for us and against them. Forward! I command!"

Orlanis, obeying, said no more, and deploying into two great squadrons, stretching crescent shape, with the horns of the curve towards the foe, we stood onward, the Ravager leading by a cable's length. It was a grand spectacle, as we drew nearer, was that hostile fleet, coming on through the deepening twilight in a long, unbroken line athwart our course, the sails bellying as the whole mighty armament tacked to and fro to make headway, the thousands of oars beating the water to the song of the rowers with rhythmic strokes, the spray curling from the pointed prows in showers of foam, the decks crowded with warriors already calling their defiance, and behind the lines of warships, the long, low pirate craft creeping on with their lateen sails. Quite forty of these vessels, which gave me more concern than a hundred of the other ships, now hove into view, the notes of the Ina-Ana floating to us faintly over the churned up waves.

My instructions to my fleet were short and simple, though strange to every seaman in it. I ordered that, contrary to our usual naval tactics, our ships were each to run alongside and board the first foe they met—never approaching more than one at once—and that the boarding parties were to make no effort to capture the hostile vessel, as was customary, but only to remain on her deck long enough to set fire to her timbers or to bore leak-holes in her bows beneath the water-line. For these purposes I had placed on every ship a number of men, some armed with huge earthen jars of highly inflammable oil, and others with sharp piercing-tools, and when their task was successfully accomplished the vessel was to draw off the doomed craft and proceed to serve another in like manner.

I had experienced some difficulty in inculcating and enforcing these injunctions, but had at length succeeded, by dint of making strong use of the queen's authority. Now, when I flew the signal for instant action, also for a squadron of fifty vessels to stay in the rear as a reserve, I saw with satisfaction these new tactics put into operation with unqualified success, to the utter astonishment and consternation of the rebel captains.

The wind was blowing from the east still, and thus assisted, we soon bore down upon them, and our first lines met in the battle-shock. Then there was crashing and bumping of prows against bows, rattling of anchor chains, and snapping of grapnels as they caught in the enemy's sides; clashing of weapons, shouts of defiance, orders loudly thundered above the din, cries of rage and pain from the wounded and dying, and yells of amaze from the foes as the ships parted again by scores, and out of the darkness that had now fallen leapt a hundred tongues of flame from a hundred burning ships, and fifty shouts of despair from as many vessels swiftly sinking into the black waters. Then the battle-line closed again, and again my ships drew back, and again uprose from a hundred rebel hulls a hundred sheets of wreathing, roaring fire, twisting the timbers and flaring up the masts, and reducing the sails and cords to blackened shreds and ashen strands, and causing the rowers to let fall their oars, rushing screaming on deck, and such of them and the crew who could not get away in the boats to leap into the sea.

Again and again my proud and curving line of war-ships dashed upon the hopelessly confused and panic-stricken foe, but not so recklessly now, nor so effectively, for the hundreds of burning and sinking ships drifting hither and thither, and ever bearing down amongst the rebel squadrons, were dangerous neighbours to sail with, and while driving Vichri's array westward before their red advance, kept us from following too closely in their wake. Well was it for us, indeed, that the wind still kept at our backs, and that the unexpected darkness of the night added to the terrors of the scene.

Fearful was the sight that these hundreds of blazing hulks presented to us, glaring vividly against the black canopy of sea and cloud-covered sky, horrible were the cries of despair, the yells and the cursings, that rose on all sides, even deadening the roaring of the flames, the snapping and crackling of the scorched wet planks, and the gurgling sound of the great ships sinking into the red-gleaming water, sucked down in a vortex of swirling foam.

All night the fight raged, ever drifting to the west and south, and woe to every straggler in the enemy's fleet who got entangled in that long line of burning craft, or coming scatheless through, fell in with our foremost ships. No mercy, no quarter was asked or given in that struggle, and when day broke we saw that the proud array that had met us so gaily and confidently in the sunset glow, was now but a sorry collection of battered argosies, running still to escape the remaining fire-ships; an armament barely numbering half its former strength, while my fleet was still sweeping on in orderly pursuit, in the same curving line, with the Ravager still ahead, and the fifty reserve ships still in the rear.

Yet the fight, I well knew, was not yet over. In the strengthening light the fire-ships looked less fearsome and were easily avoided; moreover, the rebels knew our tactics now, and would be on their guard, and retaliate in like manner also. The forty pirate vessels had so far taken no part in the struggle and were fast coming to the front, quite fresh. Still I sent my curving array at them again, and in the Ravager prepared to take a more active part in the conflict. Standing up in the prow, behind the hideous tiger-head that yawned menacingly at all who neared us, with Valdo and Atris close to my side, I waited, sword in hand, for the onset of the foremost pirate ship. Whose it was I could not tell, for like the other vessels, she flew the rebel flag alone; the red cross, outlined with white, upon a field of blue, the same that I had seen on the warship of the Prince of Aidè, when he landed on that desolate northern shore of his province.

As the long, evil-looking craft, iron-beaked like my own, drew nearer, a man stood up in the prow and hailed us. I knew him well. So had he stood and roared his challenge when I fled before him in the Seamew. 'Twas Strong-arm Thaska, and no other!

"Ha! traitor and braggart!" I cried in answer, "I am come, thou see'st, to take up thy challenge, and on the Ravager's deck to pay you with usury for treachery to your Queen!"

"Art bold now, courtier, slave, and cherisher of fair ones," roared Thaska back again; "but think not I shall run from thee as you turned tail last time we met! Come hither with thy ship, Arnon, that I may pick a water-hole in her side!"

"First see to your own ungainly craft," I answered, my temper rising at his chaffering. "Orlanis, there, shorten sail and let us stove his starboard bows into his larboard! Valdo, be ready to board with me; and, Atris, guard the stern from yonder creeping coward," for another pirate was beating up to windward with design to take us at a disadvantage.

Swiftly, then, the old Ravager, true to her guiding hand, slewed round and sheered off, just as the keen iron ram of Thaska's ship tore past our bow, missing our quickly-indrawn oars by an arrow's length, and swiftly too, as he raged helplessly past, our sharp beak was turned against his bows and with a mighty shock and a rending crash tore its rough way through planking and stanchions, and rib-rafters, making both ships rock on the shaky sea as though smitten with a palsy.

Then, as we steadily strove in vain to back out, hearing the inrush of water into the leak, and before all my crew had recovered from the knock-down blow, Thaska and his men had leapt on board in revengeful rage, led by the bulky form of Strong-Arm himself, and driven us, with their sudden charge, to the stern-end of our deck, some of their latter boarders making the ships fast together with grapnels and cables. Now, if we could not overpower our foes and cut those fastenings before the doomed vessel sank, dragging ours with it, all was lost, and fiercely we turned on our opponents, no less frenzied than themselves, and commenced to cut our way back through the compact body of the pirate crew. Then it was that my "Sunderer" stood me in good stead, and I thanked Mitres in my heart a score of times that day for having given it to me in the banquet-hall of King Menophres' palace at Thebes. Clearing a way in front with its shining blade, and followed hard by Valdo, calm and practical even in that wild turmoil, I pressed forward, the keen razor-edge of the white-flashing sword smiting invincibly through helm and breast-plate and tunic, snapping spears and shivering opposing blades, nay, even piercing clean through more than one rough pirate who encountered me in my ravaging career.

In the waist of the ship I met Thaska sword to sword, and men stood off to give us room and watch us strive like giants in our wrath. First he broke my defence, and drew a line of red across my cheek, then I seized a chance of bursting through his guard, and traced a scar of fire down his sword arm from shoulder to wrist, and next, showering blows upon me in his pain and madness so thickly that I was beaten back, he fleshed his blade in my right thigh. But ere he could withdraw it to defend himself from my next stroke, "Sunderer" had leapt up and buried itself in his side, and over he rolled in the death agony. A mighty shout rose from my men at this, and I had scarce time to pull the rankling weapon from my leg and cast it away, when, with a rush and a wild cheer, my crew swept the pirates before them over our prow and their gangway on to their own vessel. With them I was carried, striking at and severing two of the fastening cables as I went; then back we surged, for the ship were getting low in the water now, and heedless of my pain and the showers of missiles that the foe poured around me, I sprang down upon our ram and hacked fiercely at the chains that still bound the vessels together. Would "Sunderer's" edge and temper stand the strain put on it? I feared, but the good steel blade, true to its reputation, answered nobly to my call upon its power, and clove the iron links and twisted bars of bronze as neatly as a pliant elder sapling.

One is cut—now another—and now, though my arm begins to fail and an ugly dent appears in the great sword's edge, the third is broken, the ships part, and Thaska's vessel sinks in a whirling eddy, while the tough old Ravager, under the frantic impulse of her oars, sheers off in triumph, rasping roughly as she does so against the side of another pirate craft.

But Atris is true to his post, and watchful; and flushed with success my men are aboard the new enemy in the passing of a thought, and before ever I have time to join them, have fired her, have scrambled back again, and left her to her fate. Into the thick of the fight we dash again, signalling the fifty reserve vessels to advance to the front, and with their help the battle-tide turns for good, and the scattered rebel squadrons, beaten, veer round and fly before us to the westward with all the speed that sails and oars can give them.

All through the rest of that day we pursued them doggedly, hanging on their rear and picking off all loiterers in that mad race, and all through the running fight, enabled so to do by the Ravager's superior swiftness, I searched for the ship which Sothi or Vichri, or both, might be aboard; but 'twas not fated that I should find them there, and after a weary chase we gave up the pursuit at nightfall, the seventy and odd vessels that alone remained of the rebel fleet of six hundred sail making good their escape under cover of the darkness. Till dawn we rode at anchor, then turned our prows to the eastward and to home.

CHAPTER XVIII.

To the Western Land.

It was said of old by the priests of the Spirit of Life, that "success re-gilds a villain's character and maketh an ignorant fool sought after by many wiser men," and surely it is a true saying, for whatever sins and follies I, Arnon, had committed, they were all forgotten in the wild and tumultuous acclamations of praise and admiration that rose from a hundred thousand throats as, with two hundred battered and weakly-manned ships, I entered the wide-curving bay of the stately city, flying the flag of conquest.

My deeds, the success of my new naval tactics, and the heroism of the Ravager's crew, were in all mouths that day, and many days after, and it was with renewed enthusiasm that the soldiery, sailors, and populace heard that Marenso and myself were made the queen's chief ministers and generals over both land and sea forces, equal in rank and power. As for Valdo and Atris, they desired nothing better than to be known as my first and ablest lieutenants, and in such position came in for full share of the honour and glory of the victory.

Soon after my return the Sleeper came back from Aidè with his triumphant army, receiving a welcome scarcely less enraptured than my own, reporting that the rebels who had not thrown down their arms had been driven from shelter to shelter, and at last compelled to take flight across the sea, a dispirited remnant in a solitary ship, and that now not an enemy remained under arms throughout the length and breadth of Atlantis.

Marenso I found greatly changed. He had aged slightly, had worn off the strangeness of his feelings, and proved a stout-hearted warrior, fond of everything that smacked of conflict, eschewing women as rankest poison—suiting Valdo in that!—and much addicted, when not on the battlefield, to the excellent fishing and poor hunting that our country afforded. Fast friends grew he and I in the years of life that remained to him, who had wasted so many in a dreamless sleep!

I did not allow this martial ardour and popular applause to subside before I re-embarked my crews, and also a force of fifty thousand men, on board the two hundred vessels, and set forth for Ulmeca, to stamp out the revolt in its last hold. Nubia was lost by vacillation, divided councils, and apathy, when King Dulo sat on the throne, and I determined that Ulmeca should not be lost for like reasons if Marenso and I could avert such a disaster. Alas! Strong is human will, and high are human hopes, but frail is human power and foresight, and vain is human effort when the fiat of Fate has gone forth and the doom is decided. So have I always found it through my life.

Before the start I sought speech with Briseis alone, but she would grant me only a short time, saying that I had not yet fulfilled my vow of leaving no foes alive within her dominions.

"For 'tis a safe seat beside me on the silver throne that I would give thee," she said.

"Safe or unsafe," I answered, "'tis all as one to me, who would love nothing better than to live fighting your battles."

"To live so, indeed," said she softly, "but not all who go to the fight come back living, and thou mightest well be one of those, through no desire of thine, my Arnon, my Iron-fingers."

"That is true," I musingly returned, "though till I have been to the Sacred Grotto a third time, I fear not death, for so Unim has told me—and so I go, as you wish, my queen, the idol of my heart."

"Yes, go, Arnon, and may the spirits prosper thee and waft thee safely over the seas and back again to these arms that have waited thee so long and wearily; and should need be, give over Ulmeca to her native tribes, the fierce Red Barbarians, when thou hast conquered the rebels, sooner than keep a province ever in revolt."

"That advice, my queen, I shall only act upon if forced and as a last resort, but conquer Quitzaal I shall, and bring him, a prisoner, to your feet. And now, for the fleet is waiting my presence, I will say farewell."

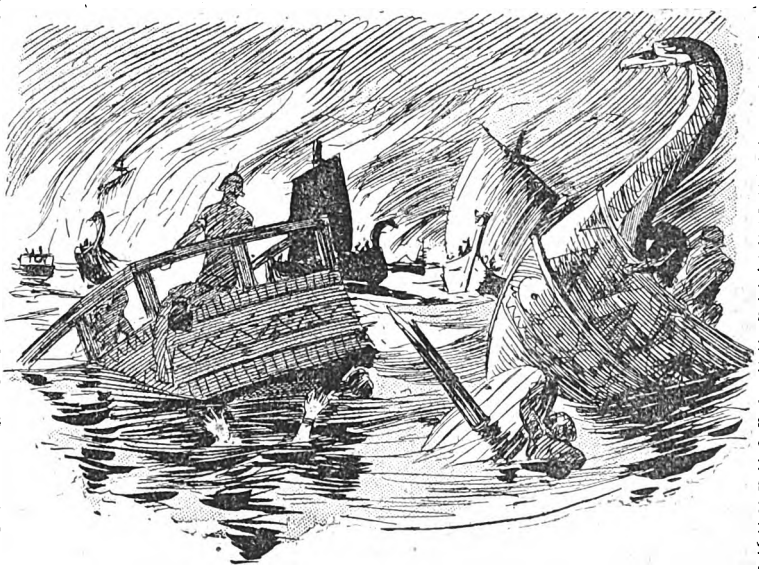
With a long impassioned kiss we parted then, she to her own especial apartment, sacred to herself and her maid Izitla; I to the harbour and the Ravager's deck once more, her sweet words ringing musically in my ears as I went: "Go, Arnon, and may the Spirits prosper thee and waft thee safely over the seas and back again to the arms that have waited thee so long and wearily." Loved words, full of heart's-ease for me in the many dreary months that followed.

I need not tell of our voyage, as the ocean gave us no trouble, and we met none of the foe's ships till we sighted the shore of that lovely western land just where the coast-line trends to the south-west in that vast island-studded, isle-starred inlet, round whose lengthy shores sweeps the wide warm current of the Summer River,* carrying its welcome heat to the ice-bound regions of the north.

There, as our fleet was crossing the yellow-weeded stream, we caught first glimpse of the rebel ships, some eighty of them, moored close inshore, and crowded from gangway to rigging with soldiers. Seeing us, they made no effort to warp out, but waited us as they were, supported, we could see, by a land force little inferior to our own.

"Not one of these vessels must escape," I said to my comrades of the Ravager; "every wooden ship of them must be burnt, sunk, or captured before ever we land a man. Do you, Atris, go aboard the Wave-cutter, take nineteen other craft, and creep down on them, shore-coasting fashion, from the north. You, Valdo, take the Ocean Wolf and do likewise from the south; you, Marenso, take forty of the heaviest-laden ships to the rear, and hold aloof till I show the red signal at my mast; and I, with the remaining vessels, will pounce upon these rebels without delay all along their line. What must be done must be done quickly ere they change their minds."

The three leaders sprang into boats and off to their duties at once, and without waiting for them I bore down with my hundred keels upon the expectant foe. This time, however, the fight was more equal, for their ships were crowded with soldiers, and over gangway planks sloping from their decks to the shore they poured fresh men as fast as we hewed them down in front. In the end we must perforce give back, one ship only being fired, and that cut loose and floating out with the ebbing tide, caused us more trouble than a little to give it free sea-room. Then I thought a moment, watching the defiant craft rising and falling slowly on the ground swell, and as I watched a brilliant idea took me. The Ravager was the only ship in either fleet now with a sharp iron ram—why not crush these stubborn foes with it in rotation as they tossed thus at my mercy? Atris and Valdo, with their two divisions, were now posted on either flank, behind me was Marenso and his forty sail, as well as the first line. There was no escape for Quitzaal's ships.



There was no escape for Quitzaal's ships.

"Furl sails and out oars!" I cried, and then as that was done: "Orlanis, go below, and make the arms of those rowers ache with pulling harder than they ever pulled before. I take the rudder, and stand clear, all of you, while I pick some peep-holes in these wooden walls! Stand clear! Easy there! Away!" and on shot the Ravager shoreward like an arrow from a bow, almost lifted out of the water by the sudden strong impetus of the hundred and fifty oars, and heading straight towards the flagship of the enemy's fleet. I held the rudder rigid when I got her pointed true, and presently, with a thunderous shock and a rasping, tearing, splintering roar, the iron beak cut its way into the side of the stricken, hopelessly injured vessel.

"Back all!" I cried soon as I saw the iron enter. "Back all, and archers and slingers forward!"

The oars eased, wavered a moment, and then seaward we shot again, leaving our enemy a crippled wreck. A score of her crew had leapt on board, but these we soon cut down, and as swiftly as could be I brought the Ravager to a standstill and charged at the neighbouring vessel without giving time for any precautionary measures on the rebels' part. Again we held our breath as the good ship gathered way, rushing headlong on her opponent, and again, successfully, we drew back, leaving a shattered hulk behind. A round dozen ships I destroyed in this fashion, and then the rest, disinclined to court a similar fate by their inactivity, cut cables and came out to meet us.

Then we closed on them from all sides, the good old Ravager ramming not a few even in motion, and the end of it was that not one of those eighty vessels, the sole remnant of Quitzaal's maritime power, escaped our hands. Those we did not burn we sank, those we did not burn or sink we captured, and having thus removed all hindrance to our movements, we steered a southerly course for a few days, anchoring near a sheltered reach of coast between two sloping, forest-clad hills, on the verge of a fertile country. Here, unmolested, I disembarked my fifty thousand men at arms, with food and war stores, and began my march across this new, strange land.

For awhile we encountered no opposition, either from the rebels or the Red Barbarians, which made me uneasy rather than glad, remembering the tactics of Ethiop in the wilds of Nubia, and it was with growing concern that I saw how the foes we ought to have met vanished before us into the inmost inland depths of the thick forest. Deserted barbarian villages we found in plenty as we went, and once the crumbling ruins of an Atlantian town of considerable size, but of friend or foe, whether white or copper-coloured, not a glimpse, not a sign.

I was troubled more than I cared to show to the soldiers, and so was Marenso, who, saying that in his day our sailors had not discovered this western land, lamented that their keels had ever touched its shores.

"When I fell asleep," said he, "Atlantis was united, and strong in her insular security, and peace reigned supreme in all her provinces. With the growth of foreign colonies has come discord, rebellion, and war, when of all things war is the worst that could befall our country. Her people have succumbed to the luxuries brought from distant lands, and are not so hardy now as when I first marshalled their hosts on the upland plains; and now that Nubia is lost to them they feel the absence of the dangerously delectable foods they obtained from thence. If this land of Ulmeca must be lost, too, it were well that it should be lost quickly, so that the generation now upspringing may grow used to the ample if humbler fare of their own fatherland."

To all of which I must needs mournfully assent, adding that of the two evils it were better to leave Ulmeca in the hands of its native savages than in possession of our hostile kindred, who would ever prove a thorn in our side.

For days we marched wearily through the hot region that lies nearest the coast, now crossing parched, sandy plains, now fertile stretches of aromatic shrubs thick-clustered with beautiful wild flowers, now cutting our way through dense copses of high trees, and anon passing a tract of mingled sterility and abundance, showing here a flat, treeless plain and there a patch of the richest bloom and most glossy tropical vegetation, growing in rank profusion. Pressing inland, we next passed large fruitful groves of indigo and vanilla, intermingled with the homely banana, flourishing its shining leaves in the overpowering heat of the vertical solar rays, and higher still, as we advanced, ever ascending a gradual slope, clumps of liquid-amber trees, and through them we gained a glimpse ahead of a range of snow-clad mountain summits towering to the sky.

Towards these, as yet having seen no foe and equally certain that there were none between us and the sea-board, we kept on, and, reaching them, climbed their rough slopes, passing now and then on our upward journey deep and precipitous ravines, whose depths glowed with life and vegetation like that we had left behind, in strange contrast to the table-land we soon reached, thick-grown with oak and pine, larch and cypress, sycamore and cedar. Once on the table-land we struck directly west, in search for the valley where the chief settlement of our countrymen was fixed, and midway across the great level, at the end of a day's tired tramping, coming round the shadow of a spur of limestone rock, the lovely spot burst on our view.

The oval valley,* near seventy leagues in circuit, bound in by huge, looming walls and ramparts of pophyritic rock —an imposing but ineffectual barrier to outside foes—was an idyllic retreat in which to live, and I did not wonder when I saw it that the Governor Quitzaal should have wished to keep it for himself and those with him rather than be overcrowded with extra colonists from Atlantis. At the verge of the valley we encamped for the night, casting many longing glances before we fell asleep at its waving fields of maze and other grain, its cotton plantations, its fruit-hung aloe groves, and its five lakes, shimmering like burnished silver shields in the fading light.

At earliest dawn we were afoot again and marching down the hillside into the great hollow, scaring thousands of bright-plumaged birds from their haunts as we went, no enemy appearing to bar our progress, till we emerged, a week later, upon a level plain at the further side of which our foremost scouts descried a group of buildings of Atlantian character clustered round a pyramidal cone, built after the fashion of our own and the Egyptian tombs of royalty.

Here, suddenly, without any warning, we were attacked by a vast horde of the barbarians—Huacans, as they called themselves—outnumbering our army, now thinned by various causes, by more than two to one, and keeping us in check for the most of a day. But these savages, for all their frightful ugliness, with their reddish cinnamon complexions, straight black hair, slanting eyes, beardless chins, protruding cheek bones, prominent noses and narrow foreheads, were no match for my men's superior weapons and discipline, and were compelled to beat a hasty retreat, leaving thousands of dead on the field of conflict. Yet they fought well, those dusky warriors, and many of my soldiers, I think, who had regarded them lightly before, held a different opinion after that battle!

With all possible speed I pressed onward, feeling sorely the need of horses—of which there were none in Ulmeca, and to which none could well be brought, on account of the difficulty and expense of transport—and by noon we reached the town, the headquarters of the colony where Quitzaal lived, or had lived; for we entered only a collection of deserted buildings and empty streets, answering and echoing weirdly to the sound of our footsteps and voices. The wolf had left his lair; the eagle had forsaken his nest!

I ascended the brick-built pyramid, towering upward for the height of thirty full-grown men, and from its summit surveyed the surrounding country. It was a magnificent prospect that met my gaze, revealing the curling blue smoke of several distant savage villages, many little winding streams and tiny lakes, a barren ridge of snow-topped hills to the south, as well as a conical cloud-piercing mountain, and to the north two great burning cones belching fire and fine ash from their flaming throats; but no sign was there of the rebels I had come so far to seek. I came down at last, cursing my luck as I came, and sought counsel with my officers and Marenso as to our wisest course.

"For my part," said Atris, "I say, let us rest here awhile and see if they attack us, finding we do not continue to seek them."

"Yes, and perchance wait here till we grow old, or be surprised by a night attack, or find our retreat cut off and the ships destroyed or gone if we ever get sight of the sea again!" cried Cuzcon, a veteran who had served under Dulo the Ninth. "Art unused to campaigning, my worthy comrade, to advise thusly?"

"So think I," struck in Valdo, "and my way would be to keep forward in the open whenever possible, and make the circuit of the valley."

"And not knowing its passes and defiles, get delayed in its tangled forests, have our men picked off by constant harassing skirmishes, and find ourselves here again, in worse plight than we are now? Good advice, forsooth!" This from Atris hotly.

"I must own that I agree with the last remarks," said another and younger officer, "but I like not the prospect of waiting here to be hemmed in and cut off."

"The more so," I observed, "when, as several of our Huacan prisoners say, the Governor has made league against us with these people, and the Ulmecs too, who were formerly hostile to him. 'Tis my belief that we have only come so far unmolested so that the three allies may gather their forces together to destroy us with one fell stroke while we are too far from the coast to make a safe retreat. But they are counting without knowledge, I imagine. However, as the oldest of us here by a thousand years, the advice of Marenso would be weighty and welcome. What thinkest thou of this matter, Sleeper?"

"I think with Cuzcon," Marenso answered, "that to wait here were folly; and with Atris that to go further into the interior were equal foolishness. What I advise is to move out upon the open plain outside this empty city and encamp, then liberate some of our Huacan prisoners, first letting them purposely overhear some of our officers say that we are only an advance guard and that within a short time a force as large again will be marching to our relief; and last of all, sternly command the barbarians not to divulge any information they may have learned in our camp. I will wager a dozen gold pieces of the heaviest weight that not many days will pass before the whole rebel army, renegade and savage, will be throwing itself to death upon our spears."

"It shall be done and without delay!" I cried, captivated with the cunning scheme. "Atris, bring in our prisoners, and we will lay the trap forthwith."

All dissension being thus happily averted by Marenso's tact, we waited till the red-faced men were brought in, maturing our plans meantime. There were some half-score of them, fierce, stubborn-looking men, garmented in all their native ruggedness, most of them able, by long familiarity with our settlers, to speak and understand our tongue, yet all obstinately refusing to utter a word, remaining mute as wooden idols 'mid all the jeers that our men made use of in futile effort to cause them to open their lips. A strange race, those Huacans!

"Now what is thy wish, General, concerning these captives?" asked Cuzcon, hustling them forward. "What is thy intent as to these beings who smear themselves with vermilion?"

"Nay; first tell me what you would with such encumbrances," I asked, keeping a straight face in spite of the old war-dog's queer smile.

"What would I do with them?" he re-echoed. "Why, just hang them up by their own bow-strings to the nearest tree."

"How long would such fruit be in coming to a full ripeness?" asked Valdo solemnly.

"Should not wait to discover," said Cuzcon, with a grim gesture, "but should lop them off by the neck as soon as hung, for they have the tint of ripeness upon their cheeks already. But before I twisted the cord to tie them up I should make them shave, for surely men never grew to this age without, in any other land than this!" And even Marenso's solemn face wrinkled into a broad smile at the pointed taunt.

During this colloquy, intended solely to embitter the savages against us, so that they might be trusted to carry any information that we might let fall, not a muscle of their dark visages moved, not an eye flashed, not a sign escaped them.

"'Twill be time to jest," said Marenso, "when the war is done and we are away for home. What is now your will concerning these prisoners? Shall we slay them or let them go?"

"Spirit tongues carry no tidings," muttered Cuzcon, fingering his sword-hilt.

"Silence!" I said, in mock severity, "I am no butcher and this place is not yet a shambles! You know full well that in a week or two we shall be joined by another army from Atlantis and shall then be able to defy these savages and their rebel allies to do their worst. Let them go; before a week is past we can laugh at all their stratagems. Let them go."

As I said this I kept a keen glance, cornerwise, upon the prisoners, and saw a gleam of savage joy flash from eye to eye, lighting their dark faces with a sudden glow of interest, yet so quickly come and gone as to be well-nigh imperceptible.

A chorus of disapproval burst upon my ears when I finished speaking; a cry of loud and angry discontent at my leniency.

"Hang them, or slit their throats!" growled old Cuzcon impatiently.

"Bind them to a tree for sling and arrow practise," said Valdo, with well-assumed coolness.

"Spear them through, nor waste further time," cried Atris bloodthirstily.

"Silence!" I again commanded. "I have given my orders. Let them go free; they are too small game for revenge. And, hark ye!" I said to the savages, as the soldiers cut their thongs, a fresh thought arising, "bear this message from Arnon the Iron-fingered to the white chief you serve, Quitzaal, and Vichri his friend—that I esteem them cowardly poltroons, and that I will search every hill and valley, every cave, every mine, every little town or hamlet, and fire every forest in all this land, before I leave its shores without them, dead or alive. Tell this to the chiefs, who are unfit to lead an army of suckling babes! Now, go with all speed, lest some of my men do you a hurt."

No further telling they needed, but rushed to the portal, out across the silent street, and dashing into the nearest copse swiftly as bullets from a sling, disappeared without so much as a word of gratitude. When they were fairly gone we looked at each other, smiling grimly at our success.

"We shall have all their available force upon us before many days have gone," I chuckled, "and we had better be preparing to greet them right royally. Out upon the plain yonder we shall fare better than cooped mid these deserted houses."

The others, agreeing, laughed, and went out to spread the news.

At sunrise our little force of 45,000, all told, was camped in eager excitement outside the forsaken town, our sentinels being posted on all the rude tracks that converged from the forest. Five days passed without sign of the hidden foe, but on the sixth morning we knew that our plot had succeeded by hearing the long shrill whistle of danger from the outermost sentries placed towards the hills. Soon these sentries were driven in before the advancing lines of the rebel and barbarian host, and by the time our men were set in waiting array, longing to come to closer quarters, the foe had got within reach of our most expert slingers, and a contest of skill between the marksmen raged furiously for over an hour. Then they fell back, waiting, I surmised, for their full number to come up before engaging us in the death-grip, giving us breathing time for further preparation.

Looking back, it seems that I have written much of war and blood and the play of men's fiercer passions, overmuch it may be, to please your sight, O, Unknown Reader! and yet I promise you that above the sound of the shock of spears, the whistle of arrows in darkening clouds, the hissing of bullets, the cries of rage and defiance, of hatred and pain, the tread of flying feet, and the shouts of exultant victory, you shall hear the note of a satisfied vengeance, and the mad despairing shriek of a woman's baffled jealousy. Ah! it seems now as though I wrought once more in that wide, forest-bounded, hill-circled plain, 'mid the surging masses of white men and red, true men and traitors, royalists, renegades, and barbarians, cutting my way through them with that right good sword as through the twisted tangled undergrowth and creepers of a dense, dark wood. Such scenes, such moments, come to few of the sons of earth, and to them but seldom in our scanty span of years, and 'tis no marvel that the recollection of them should remain a clear image on the ruffled pool of memory, when many other things are blurred or altogether missing from the picture.

Yet vivid as that image is, I hover, hesitate, and dally round the recording of it as a bashful youth delays the telling of his love to a wilful maid. Away, ye meditative thoughts, ye nervous tremors, that I may to my story.

Thus went the Battle of Ulmeca.

JUMBLED STORY No. 22.] [See Page 679.

NOVEL SAGO.

The sun sank down in the sky, and twilight came round, until the morning sun rose up in the sky.

He leant back in his chair, and threw his black crown to the soles of her white feet. A girdle of comfort stole over him. He opened them again.

"Oh, that's good," he cried. "Ha, ha! Why, dare you speak so. Who are you?"

"The fierce beasts of the forest shall hear the song.

"I will write a Song of Love," cried the Poet, and all nations, and all kindreds shall take up the Song of Love, and turn from the trail.

The Poet sank down on the lounge. He looked sharply, as though he would strike the other.

He closed his eyes. A delightful sense of sound of the clashing of steel, and the neighing of long watches of the night, and worked the hours searched for Love. He looked in the palaces of kings, gazed at the beautiful queen. Days went by and, he looked in the hovels of paupers.

The Poet shut down the window and walked out of the house, he cared not whither.

One morning, there came into the gallery a little throne, clad all in sheening white, a smile on her card, and the name was the name on the picture.

And Love smiled from her eyes.

And as he gazed at the Queen of Love, the words float up into the air, and the great birds of prey leave the green grass untouched.

The Poet gazed at her for a moment, horror shall ring out on the silent air, and all men, and horses, and the shrieks of men, shall float the music of Love."

"The king shall hear it as he sits upon his throne of Love, and the soldiers shall drop their swords to happiness.

"And the gentle deer shall raise their heads, and old Faith shall be new.

But Love does not come when he is called. Some crossed before her, white, entrancing.

"The queen at his side shall hear the words of earth, and all shall be still, as the last sweet notes wrote again a new Song of Love. And Love guided over the earth, but still the Poet sat in his seat and stricken. His blood seemed to freeze in his veins. Well, she's fine, ain't she?"

"She seems about to knock you over—my Queen. "A Song of Love" in his hand, he read it through into the eyes of the queen. It seemed that Love days passed into weeks, and always the Poet was at a house near by. He pushed open a door.

"And outside in the courtyard the princes shall cease their rush for gold."

A queen stood before him on the steps of her couch, smoking, and drinking brandy. Her hair was the Song of Love.

And then—why then he saw Love smiling down on his hand, he wrote across the paper: "The Song for the last time. He laid it on the coals.

The little man laughed loudly.

And the flames licked it up.

"And all that is black shall be white. And the precious stones encircled her waist. Her arms were done up untidily on the top of her head. She leered "and all the world shall hear it."

"Is it possible," he groaned, "that you created hair away from his high, white forehead.

The artist did not mind.

He sat down at the table, and taking his pen in his hand, and inspiration flowed from his pen.

Then with a loud cry he rushed from the room.

Presently, weary, footsore, and hungry, he saw an garret window. The roar of the London traffic shall listen, and pause in their flight, and poise, from tree to tree, and remain very still.

"Above the din of the battlefield, above the room. A woman, painted, hideous, was lying on a open door before him. He entered, and passed her?"

The Poet's dream dissolved away.

"The great, new city of Babylon shall hear the man with untidy, flowing hair. He strode up to the ground."

"Don't speak to me," he cried. "Begone!"

Very beautiful were the words of the Poet, and come with me, I will show you my model."

So he laid down his pen, and went out into the words that I shall sing, and for a space men will listen, and their games shall be forgotten.

"And peace shall fall on the land, and joy, and sweet was his music. He wrote on through the bright, sunlit streets. Throughout the long day he had deserted them. He looked at the artist.

But the little man laughed more loudly than came up from the streets.

He took the Poet by the arm, and led him into wondering, over the earth.

The Poet rose from his chair, and threw open his lips, her glistening hair falling down from her golden first words of the song, gently, softly, and through a hall, and sank down on a velvet lounge.

"So come to me, Love," cried the Poet, "and guide him from the eyes of a beautiful woman.

That night, he made a fire in his room, and taking his post, adoring, worshipping.

"And the music of the song," he cried, "shall thou art."

"And men shall hold their breath.

"Yes, man," he said, "that's so. If you care to man that picture's mine. I painted it."

"What do you mean?" he said sharply. "How before. "Here's proof," he cried, and drew out a thing was lacking in the Poet's song.

"The little sparrows shall hear it as they flutter and rules his land.

"Then, from the silence, shall come again the then louder and louder, till the triumphant strain of the song shall die away.

The Poet, dazed and trembling, advanced into the the Poet, and stared at him insolently.

"Then a great quietness shall come over the at her visitor, showing her broken teeth.

The Poet rose to his feet, and drew his arm back my hand, that I may write of thee, and tell men what of his song framed themselves in his mind. He fiercely backwards and forwards across his room.

FLEUR-DE-BLÉ.

It was the eve of Saint Nicholas, and grand preparations were going on for the next day's celebration at a certain house in the market-place of the little village of Wavre, belonging to the baker, Hans Jans.

Upstairs, in the large room with the two windows, over the shop, the light of a great fire and a tiny night-lamp glistened on the polished oak of the handsome spare bed with its pink beflowered curtains, in which Jans' little daughter, Fleur-de-Blé, was lying.

Grandmamma Jans from time to time placed another log upon the fire, carefully turning over the blazing coals, and, pushing back her spectacles over the brown bands which she wore upon her white hair, she went softly to the bed.

"Fleur," she said gently, opening the curtains. And the red lamp threw its light upon Fleur-de-Blé, cuddled down under the bedclothes, with only her tiny little arms and face showing.

Twice since the great tall clock in the shop had struck seven, calling Fleur-de-Blé, and the child had not awakened.

She kept hearing the tinkling of the little bell at the shop door, which rang every time a customer came in; and a great many customers were coming in that evening, for everyone knew that Jans made the finest gingerbread men in the whole village.

And every time the bell rang, Grandmamma Jans would wonder if it were for a six-sous man, or one for a franc. Those that sold for a franc had white-sugared hair and pink-sugared cheeks, while the six-sous men were nothing but dough.

Hans ought to have made some two-franc men, too, for there will always be people willing to pay two francs when their neighbours pay only one. Madame Jans stood behind the counter, waiting on the customers and looking askance at the boys outside, who with noses red and hands in their pockets, were gathered about the shop window, admiring the gingerbread men; while Jans in the baking-room was saying:

"Come, boys! On with the dough! I'm going to make Fleur's man now."

And through the window of the little back room, Madame Jans could see Hans, with his bare arms, in his white blouse and white trousers, coming and going in the ruddy light among the baker boys bending over the kneading-trough.

He took the largest of the moulds, buttered it, poured the dough in slowly, and plunged it quickly into the oven. "Ah, Fleur," thought Madame Jans, "what a handsome gingerbread man your papa is making for you! There is not another man in all Wavre who can give such a shape to dough. I certainly couldn't have done better, being myself a baker's daughter, than marry Hans."

Jans at this very moment was drawing out from the burning coals a magnificent gingerbread man, smoking and light, which he detached from the pan with a sharp blow, and laid on a shelf sprinkled with flour. He was a portly gentleman in small clothes, with a mitred cap upon his head, a queue down his back, a cane with a bishop's cross in his hand, and pockets overflowing with toys. On his buckled shoes there was a scroll, and printed on it these words:

"Saint Nicholas."

Then he put pink icing on the cheeks and nose of the saint, sprinkled aniseed over his peruke, spread chocolate on his coat, and currant jelly on his waistcoat, powdered the cross and cap with gold-dust, and put a layer of white sugar on his hands and stockings; then he called his wife, and showed her his masterpiece, saying:

"See, Annette, the gingerbread is thick with citron, orange and raisins. I wouldn't sell this Saint Nicholas for five francs, for I might not be able to make another one so well for ten."

Fleur-de-Blé awoke suddenly, saying in her soft little voice:

"Grandmamma, I smell something good. Has Saint Nicholas been here yet?"

This little voice of Fleur's seemed like the last vibrations of sharply-struck crystal, when one hears nothing but a sound dying away.

"No, my child," replied Grandmamma Jans, putting the little arms under the bedclothes. "Saint Nicholas hasn't come yet, but he is going his rounds about town and that is what smells so good."

"Grandmamma, what makes it smell good when Saint Nicholas goes his rounds?"

"Because Papa Jans is baking his gingerbread men in the oven. He has some six-sous men and some for a franc. Won't you have a little drink?"

"Grandmamma," replied the child, "I have had a dream. I dreamed that Saint Nicholas came for me in my bed. And he had a long beard like that picture of our Lord that Godmother Dictus gave me. And I said: 'Good-morning, Saint Nicholas, patron of good children.' And he said to me, grandmamma, just like this: 'Fleur-de-Blé, I am indeed your patron, for you are a good little girl, and I like good little children. Come with me.' And I said: 'Where, good Saint Nicholas?' and he said: 'Come.' Mamma gave me a pretty white dress, and said she would come later. And when I entered paradise there were little boys and girls there, all in white, playing. And they took me in their arms, and told me they were always at play, night and morning, and they had playthings that our Lord gave them, ever so much prettier than those papa gave me last New Year. And the little girls had dolls as large as they were, and that could courtesy and say: 'Thank you, madam.' Then Saint Nicholas kissed me, and said: 'Play, my child. I love you dearly. You shall have a doll, too, that will say: "Thank you, madam."' And then, grandmamma, I smelt something good and I woke up."

"Here is Dr. Trousseau coming to bid you good-morning, Fleur-de-Blé," said Grandmamma Jans suddenly.

The Doctor opened the door, and going straight to the bed, said:

"It is Papa Trousseau, come to see how you are, my dear. Let's feel that little pulse. Hum-hum-m; and now for the tongue. Your cheeks are flushed, little one. There has been some excitement going on. Ah, yes. I know now. Saint Nicholas' Eve. That's it."

He puts his hands to the child's heart and then his ear, and his eyes suddenly began to roll under his heavy grey eyebrows, like the ball the men play ninepins with at "The Headless Rooster."

Just then Jans and his wife came in like shadows, one behind the other, on tiptoe, and holding their breath, and Dr. Trousseau began to whistle softly to conceal his anxiety.

Then, taking his hat and umbrella, he dashed off to the vicarage to let the vicar know.

Now, the vicar was very fond of the Jans' and used to dine with them often on Sundays in the summer.

By-and-bye, the vicar, with his three-cornered cap on one side, opened the door of the little shop and said to Papa and Mamma Jans, who were counting up their day's sales, laying the sous and francs each in a little pile of their own:

"Here I am, as you see. How do you do, Madame Jans? I've come to see if Fleur-de-Blé has put her little wooden shoes in the chimney corner."

"Why, it is Monsieur le Vicaire," said Jans, taking his pipe from his mouth and leading him into the little back parlour. "Grandmother Jans will be very glad to see you."

Just then the door of the room above was opened, and Grandmamma Jans cried quickly:

"Hans! Hans!"

"Oh, yes, I know," said Jans. "Fleur-de-Blé keeps calling for me every minute to have me tell her about Saint Nicholas, the dear angel. Come upstairs, Monsieur le Vicaire."

"Dear, dear!" cried grandmamma, when she saw them. "Fleur-de-Blé has just got up, and she wants to go down in the market-place. Your blessing, Monsieur le Vicaire."

Fleur-de-Blé, with wide opened eyes, was gazing towards the windows with a vacant stare.

"Fleur!" cried Jans like a madman, and he laid the little child down in the warm blankets again.

Monsieur le Vicaire, turning towards Jans, saw that he was as white as the sheets on the bed, and that his hands were trembling.

Fleur-de-Blé gently closed her eyes and fell asleep, but her little hands, as transparent as a night-lamp in which a light is burning, moved idly in vague gesture on the counterpane.

"Courage, Jans," said the vicar, gently laying his hand on his shoulder. "Think of our Saviour Who suffered the Passion."

But Jans, with haggard eyes, was looking at his child and did not hear him.

Then Fleur began to move her lips softly, as if she were whispering to someone on the other side of the night, and at last she said:

"I am Fleur-de-Blé, the daughter of Jans, the baker, who lives in the market-place."

She was silent a moment, and then went on: "Good-morning. Always at play. Dolls. Thank you, madam."

Her voice was like the softest note of a violin, and while she spoke a wan little smile was on her lips, which seemed like a little light cloud melting away in the night. Jans saw her pretty little arm emerge from the sheets, and she waved her hand slowly, as she did for a bow when she used to say her little pieces.

Then, after half-an-hour, Fleur-de-Blé awoke again.

"Hasn't Saint Nicholas come yet?" she asked.

"No, Fleur," said Jans. "Saint Nicholas never comes before midnight."

"Oh, that is very long," said the little child. "But he comes from far away, and his reindeer are tired. Papa, you must get an armchair for Saint Nicholas, and a smaller one for the reindeer."

"Indeed, I will," said Jans. "I'll let Saint Nicholas have the handsome armchair that stands in the corner—the one Aunt Catherine has when she comes to see us at Christmas."

And at about eleven o'clock, Jans went downstairs to prepare the Saint Nicholas gifts for Fleur-de-Blé. He had bought a large doll, with eyes of mother-of-pearl, blonde hair, and a jointed body; and a cradle too, lined with blue satin, and hanging from a crescent moon. He had paid fifteen francs for it all.

He put the doll in the cradle and arranged the doll's clothes in a large box—the silk mantle, the barege dress, and the rose-coloured hat. And he laughed softly to himself, thinking of the joy of his Fleurette, for handling all these pretty things had brought back a little happiness into his heart.

He took off his shoes and went upstairs twice in his stocking-feet; the first time to carry the plates of bonbons, the second to carry the doll, the cradle, and the box of doll's clothes. And he put them all in the little room next to that in which Fleur-de-Blé was lying.

And Fleur slept on.

"I want to see her when she gets her Saint Nicholas presents," said the vicar to Grandmamma Jans. "That is what I'm staying for."

But that is not why the vicar stayed. He drew his breviary from his pocket, and his lips moving softly in an inaudible manner, he began to read near the little lamp. But from time to time the vicar looked at Fleur-de-Blé, and then he would say in a half whisper, closing the book with his finger in it to keep the place: "O Lord, have mercy on these poor people."

When midnight came, Fleur-de-Blé heard a noise in the house, and, opening her eyes, she asked if it wasn't Saint Nicholas coming down the chimney. And Jans, who knew very well that it was the boys in the oven-room, said, as he raised his flour-besprinkled eyebrows, that he certainly thought he could hear the reindeers' hoofs. And he added:

"I'll go and see in a minute."

He put his ears to the door, with his head forward, as if he were listening attentively, and then went downstairs with long, slow strides, and an air of the greatest mystery.

And suddenly, from below, they could hear loud cries of joy.

It was Jans saying: "Fleur, my little Fleur, he has come! Open your little hands!" And when he returned, he was carrying the armchair, the one that Aunt Catherine used to sit in, and on it were the cradle, the doll, the box, the gingerbread man, and the plates of sweetmeats.

"Thank you, Saint Nicholas. Thank you, for Fleur," he called down the staircase.

And when the child saw the pretty doll and the cradle, her little lips broke into a smile, as a flower opens to the sun.

Then Jans showed her the dust on the armchair (he had put it there himself from his dusty shoes), and said, laughing with all his heart:

"See here are the footprints of Saint Nicholas' steeds!"

Soon after Fleur-de-Blé dropped her head like a stone bruised tree whose sap is oozing away, and, pale against the whiteness of the great pillow, with her pretty, sad smile still upon her lips, she fell asleep.

A heavy silence filled the house, the shop clock struck one, and a dog could be heard howling in a neighbouring yard.

"Monsieur le Vicaire," said Grandmamma Jans, clasping her hands, "I fear that there is a great sorrow coming down upon this house."

"Grandmamma Jans," replied the vicar, raising his hands towards Heaven, "we must think of God, with Whom all things are possible."

And as the minutes went by silence grew deeper and deeper about the great bed, where the darling of the household was asleep. Outside, the snow was falling against the panes with a soft rustling of a bird who wants to come in. And Jans, like a man in a fever, with his teeth chattering, repeated over and over to himself the name of his little Fleur.

While these things were going on at the Jans', a bright, cheerful glow was lighting up one of the rooms in Butcher Canu's house. Dolls and wooden horses covered the big table and everywhere were flags and pipes and drums.

Suddenly the good man, who was putting on his night-cap, said to his wife as he looked towards the Jans':

"Indeed it doesn't seem natural. I see shadows coming and going on the white curtain. If Fleur was as strong as our own little girls we wouldn't need to worry, but she is like a bit of down blown by the wind."

In all the houses everywhere, in town or country, the little children of the poor and of the rich were fast asleep, dreaming, with their heads on their arms, of the toys and sweetmeats they would find on awaking.

Grandmamma Jans had let her knitting fall on her lap, and was dozing by the fire, her spectacles on her nose. But neither Papa nor Mamma Jans thought of sleep, they stood in front of the bed, with clasped hands, not daring to look at each other for fear of letting their tears be seen. And the vicar, with hands clasped like them, said: "Fleur's breathing is like the sound of a church bell as the summer wind carries it far into the country when it is about to cease."

The little child slumbered on so quietly that nothing was heard in the room but the crackling of the oil in the lamp and the heavy breathing of Grandmamma Jans.

When the good old lady awoke she was astonished at first to find that the Vicar was still there, but as she saw Papa and Mamma Jans on their knees near Fleur, she drew out her large checked handkerchief, and began weeping in it with the sobs of a little child.

At that very moment Fleur-de-Blé awoke, and, very softly, so softly that Grandmamma Jans, who was slightly deaf, could not hear her, she murmured:

"Good-morning, St. Nicholas."

And then still more softly:

"Morning, papa, mamma, gran'm'ma."

She slept till dawn. And as the day came, her life, like a chilly bird returning to the sunny lands when the cold winds blow, returned to the great light.

Softly the light went out. And awesome sadness passed over the old furniture so often caressed by her little hands. The ivory Christ on the wall seemed to bend beneath the cross.

It was the hour when cocks crow. The children of Wavre awakened earlier than usual, went listening at the door to see if there were any noises in the house.

A cry rang out in the chamber.

"Ah, vicar!" cried Jans, throwing himself into the arms of the priest.

"Jans, Fleur has just entered Paradise!" replied the vicar.

And never from that day to this has poor Monsieur Jans ever made any more gingerbread men for St. Nicholas' Day.

CHAPTER XLIX.

AFTER THE CHAIN WAS BROKEN.

"'WILL he die?' I hope so, my lady—when he's about eighty. God bless him! We can't spare such a man as he is. Now, please, my lady. The bottle, and you'll see a glass. Bring two, please, and that water jug."

Olive sprang to her feet, and easily found what was wanted, when Rancer, after a business-like glance at the label, removed the stopper, and poured two small portions of the clear liquid into glasses, added water, and offered one glass to Lady Braetoun, but she made an impatient gesture.

"Yes: drink it, my lady. You want it, too. Don't waste time. It's only what you would call sal volatile. And you must hold up."

She drank the contents of the glass without a word, and then, in obedience to another order, fetched a sofa cushion, which she placed beneath Murray's head as the man raised him up and lowered him down again, prior to beginning to trickle, a little at a time, the stimulant between his parted lips.

"Beg pardon, my lady," whispered Rancer meaningly; "wouldn't you like to wash your hands?"

Olive glanced down, and then shuddered, for they were terribly marked, and she hurriedly went to the little mahogany stand and began to remove the traces there.

"His blood—stained with his blood," she thought; and the horror of her position began to reassert itself, and the desire to escape from the place; but with it came a passionate feeling of anger against her husband which she could not restrain, and she walked firmly back to where Rancer knelt with the glass still in his hand, ready to look up and give her a nod, as much as to say:

"He's coming round."

A few minutes later there were hasty steps in the hall, then a slight, tall, and grey, elderly man entered and closed the door after him.

"Dr. Murray!" he said. "Good Heavens! how was this?"

He glanced first at Rancer and then at Olive, with a curious, inquisitive light in his searching eyes which made her shrink and the angry stubborn feeling increase.

"Patient, sir," said Rancer quickly. "Old patient, sir. Touch of D.T. again. Got away from home. Mad sort of fit, and shot at my master. Ball through the left scapula. Lung untouched. Another ball cut deep furrow in the inner part of left arm."

The surgeon darted another quick glance at Olive, one full of dislike, as he took in her beautiful, agitated features, and the hot, indignant blood began to mantle in her pale face.

"Humph! Cherchez la femme," he said to himself, as he went down on one knee and began to examine his patien carefully. "Poor fellow! How could he be such a fool I shouldn't have thought it of him."

Rancer placed a chair for Lady Braetoun, but she shook her head and stood looking on, and then shivered, for there was a slight trembling about the victim's eyelids, and a twitching of the lips.

"Plugged entrance and exit, Rancer?" said the surgeon, with a quick look.

"Yes, sir."

"How near to the articulation of the arm-bone?"

"Very close, sir."

"Shattered?"

"Can't say, sir. I only tried to stop the bleeding."

"Quite right. What's in that glass?"

"Ammonia, sir."

There was another examination, and Olive became aware now of the fact that Murray's eyes had opened wildly, that he was conscious of what was going on, and that there was a wistful, imploring look directed at her which made her tremble; but the eyes closed again, and she saw that he had relapsed into insensibility.

"I don't think I'll disturb these bandages for the present. The shock is bad enough, and the bleeding has stopped. You had better order a bed to be made up for him here at once, madam. Safer than moving him upstairs."

"Oh!" cried Olive wildly; "then you think his wounds dangerous?"

"H'm—no, not dangerous, but bad enough for so highly strung and nervous a man. You must have a nurse sent for, but I suppose you will wish to nurse him to some extent yourself?"

"I? Impossible."

"I beg pardon. I was under the impression that you were Mrs. Murray, though I was——"

"I am Lady Braetoun, sir," said Olive with dignity; and she darted a look of resentment at the speaker.

"And the insane patient——?"

"I cannot explain or say any more to you than you have already been told."

"No, no, madam, of course not," said the surgeon hurriedly. "I will send on a nurse, with your permission."

"I have no authority to give permission, sir," she said coldly. "Pray do what is necessary to save Dr. Murray's life. I came on here in dread lest anything should occur, my husband being in so excited a state, but I was too late."

"Pray do not trouble yourself to make these explanations, madam," said the doctor as coldly; and the air of half contempt, half dislike, intensified as he looked at her. "I will go now, and send in a nurse, and as soon as she comes I must ask you——as a friend of Dr. Murray?"

"Yes, sir: Dr. Murray is an old friend of my husband."

"Exactly. I will ask you then to see that the arrangement I have ordered is made."

"If it is necessary—yes."

The surgeon shrugged his shoulders.

"I will stay, sir," she said, with another flash of resentment, and as she turned from him she caught Rancer's eyes, and saw that he was watching with a peculiar look as if the surgeon's manner had influenced him, and her father's nature within her roused a stubborn feeling approaching recklessness.

In her terribly excited state anger was now taking the place of fear, and she listened to what more the surgeon had to say without a word, watching his various acts, as it were, in a stubborn silence, till he bowed coldly, and left her with Rancer, whose manner now seemed quite changed.

No: she determined she would not—she could not—go now, and leave Murray dying, let them—let the whole world, think what it would; she could bear it.

For a brief time a creeping sensation of pain came over her as she thought of Braetoun and the pistol he had taken with him; but it passed off, for she felt that he would not use it against himself. His true nature seemed to be unveiling itself more and more before her. His past infidelities she had been ready to forgive, and had forgiven; but this last threat to return to the only woman who had ever loved him, and the cruel insults which had accompanied it, in the presence of Murray, seemed to break the last tie between them.

"He has cast me off. I cannot go back now."

In spite of herself she turned to look at him who lay there pale and motionless, and mingled with the horror with which she regarded the cause of her anguish, there was a curious feeling of pity—for what had been his sin?

She turned from him, though, frightened, but only for the anger to return.

Rancer was looking at her furtively, and, feeling that she divined his thoughts, she forced herself to try and think of her plan of action. But again her ideas were diverted back to the present, for Rancer spoke.

"I don't think you need be quite so much alarmed, my lady," he said; "and I should be very grateful if you would give me orders what to do, for I feel too much upset to plan. I oughtn't to send for the police, ought I?"

"The police? No!" she said in an excited whisper.

"Thank you, my lady. Then we've settled that: it's one thing off my mind. Perhaps you wouldn't mind telling me what you think about sending for someone else to come."

Ah, yes; send for someone else. Why had she not thought of this before—her father?

She was about to request the man to send at once, but a strange feeling of dread assailed her.

Send for him to come and find her there? She felt that she could not. A few hours earlier it would have appeared to her as the most natural thing for her to do; but all that was changed. She had been charged with being one of the most guilty of creatures; doctor and servant had evidently looked upon her as the mainspring of the tragedy, and, if she sent for her father, what guarantee had she that he would not think the same?

Impossible? No, he would find her there, learn that Braetoun had followed and found her.

Roderick had attacked and nearly killed Murray.

No, she dared not send for her father to come there; he might doubt her. Why not, when in her despair she was almost beginning to doubt herself, and feel that Murray's passionate declaration of his love had in some way made her a partner of his guilt?

Turning to Rancer, she asked what friends there were of Murray's near.

"None, my lady," said the man, as he still seemed to look at her curiously. "Master has so few friends. There are his two cousins—two maiden ladies."

"Yes? Then they must be fetched at once."

"But they went to Florence about a month since, my lady. I posted a letter for them from my master only about three days ago."

Olive clasped her hands in anguish. What should she do? She must not stay, though the feeling was upon her that if she went and left Murray to the care of some paid nurse, and he died, she would always feel that she was to blame.

Then a thought came. His old schoolfellow.

"Mr. Daines," she cried.

"Ah, yes. I did not think of him, my lady. Shall I fetch him?"

"Yes," cried Olive, on the impulse of the moment, and the man hurried out, while as the door closed she started toward it to arrest him, but it was too late.

She ran to the window to tap as Rancer went by, but he had gone in the other direction, and she turned, now, to stand trembling and watching the recumbent figure, looking so ghastly and strange in the gloomy room.

It was horrible! Alone with him like that. Every action on her part seemed to be compromising her more and more. But she felt that she could not stir. Once she went to the bell to ring for one of the maids, but her hand fell to her side, and at last she walked slowly to Murray to stand gazing down at him, finding him look so cold and still that the fancy came that he must be dead; and as if drawn to him, she sank down on one knee to listen for his breath.

But she could hear nothing, neither could she see the slightest movement; and, trembling more with horror, she at last stretched out a hand to touch his forehead.

It was cold and damp, and, wild now with fear, her hand glided to his wrist, and she felt for the pulse there, but felt in vain. Still it was warm, and she let her fingers glide to his hand; that felt moist and warm too.

The touch slightly roused Murray, who opened his eyes slowly, and looked at her vacantly. Then the light of recognition came into them, and as she loosened her grasp and shrank away, he smiled at her sadly and closed his eyes once more.

An hour passed slowly, during which Murray did not move but seemed to sleep, and then a cab stopped at the door, and she ran to the window in time to see Daines get out and come limping up to the door, Rancer following; then there was the rattle of the latchkey, steps in the hall, and Olive waited for her husband's old schoolfellow to enter.

"Thank Heaven you have come!" she cried, as she held out her hand.

He did not seem to see it, but bowed stiffly, and went by her to kneel down by his friend.

"How has he been?" Daines said sharply, but he had to repeat his question, and he looked up angrily.

"Dr. Murray has only opened his eyes once," said Olive, in a low, choking voice which she vainly tried to make steady.

"But where is the nurse? One was to have been here and a bed prepared."

She gave him a resentful look, but answered humbly enough:

"I could do nothing until Dr. Murray's servant returned."

"No, I suppose not," he said, bending lower over the motionless figure; "but something must be done at once. Will you go now, Lady Braetoun? I'll take charge of my poor friend. You cannot stay here."

"No," she said piteously, "I cannot stay here; but can I not help—can I not do something before I go?"

"You've done harm enough as it is," said Daines to himself, as he bent lower. Then without looking up—"No, I don't see that you can do anything, madam. Poor fellow! he seems pretty well at death's door, and it is our duty to keep that door shut if we can. If he comes to and sees you here it will only make matters worse."

"Mr. Daines," whispered Olive wildly; "you do not understand."

"I understand all I want to," he replied bitterly. "Rancer, here, has told me that Braetoun came and surprised you together. There, it is of no use to mince matters now. It is very terrible, but I suppose it is quite in the fashion, and Braetoun has only himself to blame."

"Mr. Daines, I cannot explain to you," she cried, in a suffocating voice, "but you are misjudging me horribly, and some day you will bitterly regret all this."

"I hope I shall," he said coldly; "but, excuse me, it is my duty to do the best for the poor fellow, and the first thing is to obtain quiet."

"But Mr. Daines—" she whispered, with her lips quivering; but he broke out angrily.

"In Heaven's name, pray go, madam!" he cried. "I want to save his life if I can. I will stay with him and see that everything possible is done. You have no carriage, I saw; let Rancer get you a cab."

He went to the door and spoke to the man, who was waiting; and, too much stunned by the increase of suffering, Olive stood gazing after him till the door opened again.

"The cab I came in is waiting," he said. "Lady Braetoun ——oh, I have no right to speak," he cried sharply.

"You cannot wound me more deeply than you have done," she replied quietly. "What were you about to say?"

"I was going to implore you not to go back to your own home. There is enough of tragedy here as it is. You had better go straight to your father's house, at once; and for Heaven's sake, madam, make a clean breast of it, and ask his advice as to what had bet.er be done."

"Make a clean breast of it," said Olive, as she sank back in her cab; "I must be guilty then, indeed, if everyone judges me like this. Father will not judge me as others do. But when he knows all, what will he say?"

Nothing: for a new agony awaited her on reaching Eaton Place. Isaac Emsworth was quite insensible, and a month of careful nursing elapsed before he knew a portion of the truth, that which made him swear that at all hazards his child should stay in her old home. By which time Murray had nearly recovered his strength.

CHAPTER L.

Down at Sandiwell.

"It's a wonderful thing, that whitewashing, Baby. Fancy him being sold up and saving that house of his, and going on again just as if nothing had happened. Ah, it's a wonderful thing, is the law."

"Be quiet, Auntie. I don't like to hear you talk like that."

"I must talk a bit, my dear, about what's on my mind."

"But you don't understand anything about it."

"Oh, yes I do, my dear; a little bird tells me a deal, and I hear more than you think. I can't get over it, Baby. He never did beayve to you as he ought, and how you can go on as you do caps me. You ain't no more sperrit than a mouse."

"Be quiet, Auntie; but if you must talk, say something about going with me."

"No, my dear; you don't ketch me on the box of one of them nasty top-heavy gentlemen's stage coach things again. I might get my neck broke, and I suppose they couldn't mend that. And do you know, my dear, I think you'd better give it up. There's a gnawing in my broken arm, and I'm sure as sure we're going to have rain, and if we do it will last all the week."

"Oh Auntie, who wants you to go on a drag? And it's lovely."

"Course it is, my dearest, always is just when it's going to be as bad as bad. That's Nature's own nasty deceitful way, coaxing you into putting on your best frocks, and then down she comes upon 'em and turns your bonnet into a wisp."

"But you can't tell that the weather's going to be bad, Auntie, and I must go."

"Can't tell? Why, my arm kept me awake half the night. The shooting pains was horrible, just starting from the nubble you can feel in the bone, where it growed together again."

"Poor dear Auntie!"

"Ah, you may well say that, my dear. I suffer agonies with it sometimes. I'm sure the doctor left a splint of a bone in it, and never took it out, after it was getting better."

"Impossible, Auntie."

"Ah, you don't know, my dear. I heard 'em talking about the splints when it was set, and the bone wouldn't shoot like that if there hadn't been a sharp bit left in."

"But I must go, Auntie. I want to see the race. Do, do, say you'll come."

"I don't want to go out, Baby, till week after next, and then as things are so slack it'll be just the time for our bit o' ollerday. We'll have three weeks at Margate, and stay at the hotel, and then there'll be no worry about cooking or anything. I do hate those lodging-letting people and their nasty ways of sticking it into you for extries, and sampling your tea, coffee, and things till it's shameful. A dozen o' stout never means more'n ten bottles, if it don't nine. Never mind the race."

"Oh, I must see the race, Auntie. I've have heard all about it from Mr. Daines: he says that it's poor Rod's last chance, and that if the mare doesn't pull it off he is utterly ruined."

"And a good job too. Serve him precious well right, for the way he has behaved to you."

"Oh, Auntie—Auntie!"

"And Baby, Baby! And a precious baby you, for going on thinking about him after his cruel ways to you. Throwing you over again as he has."

"You don't know, Auntie. He has been so ill again."

"But I just do, my dear, for I've got it all out of Mr. Daines when he's been sitting chatting to me."

"Mr. Daines has been abusing Rod to you!" cried the girl, with her eyes flashing.

"No, nor he ain't been abusing my lord to me neither. Mr. Daines never told me anything but what I regularly dragged out of him, but I did find out about my lord being separated from his wife. Mr. Daines is a very good little man, though he has sometimes got a tongue like a razor that's been dipped in vitriol."

Lucy started; her lips parted, and she stared wildly at her aunt.

"But he can't help that. It's all on account of his being different to most people. But I like him, though he does laugh at me; and he loves you, my dear, and if you weren't such a little silly you'd say yes! to him, and be Mrs. Cyrus Daines, as you might be any day you liked."

"Yes, he has been setting you to worry me now," said Lucy disdainfully.

"Never a word. He bears it all like a lamb, and regular suffers to see you think of nothing but that good-for-nothing scamp of a lord, as has thrown you over disgraceful again and again."

Lucy turned her face away, fighting hard to keep down her resentment.

"I'm obliged to speak, for it is disgraceful. Fine dresses and diamonds one time, and let you starve in a gutter the next for all he'd care. Never a shilling sent to you now."

"I don't want his money," said Lucy bitterly.

"No more don't I, and if he'd sent anything we'd have sent it back in a jiffy. We can be quite independent of him, and so I tell my lord. You ain't got a bit o' pride in you, Baby."

"Oh, do leave off, Auntie."

"Shan't. It puts my back up. If he'd chucked you as he did to marry his pretty young wife and stick to her, hard it would have been on you, my precious—but being a lord and no money to keep it up unless he married some, as I s'pose a lord must, I wouldn't ha' said a word—though he might ha' done worse than marry you, for there's a heap of money in you, Baby, and you wouldn't ha' been too proud to go on the stage now and then when he run short, though you were his wife. I know you, my pet. You'd ha' worked your fingers to the bone for him, even if you had been my lady, as he ought to have made you."

The tears began to trickle down Lucy's cheeks now.

"But it wasn't to be, and I'm glad of it, for he's one o' that sort as thinks o' nothing but himself. He's behaved shameful to his young wife, same as he has to you, and from what I can hear she's just such a poor fondling kitten of a thing as you are. Don't think about him any more."

"But about Mr. Daines?" said the girl, with a flash of resentment in her eyes.

"No, nor about him neither. Think about your own dear pretty self, and a little bit about your poor old auntie, who'll do anything to make you happy. Now look here, Baby; if you'll only be a good girl, I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll chuck up the business, and we'll go and live retired where you like. Paris in France, where it's nice and gay, and plenty of theaytres to remind us of the old days, or we'll have a trip to Switzerland if you like, so long as you don't want me to climb no mountings."

"No, no, Auntie, I only want to go and see this race. I want the mare to win, dear, and save him from ruin."

"Why?"

"Because I love him, Auntie, and always shall. You wouldn't like me to be a miserable, light thing without a bit of heart in me, now, would you?"

"Why, of course not, my precious," cried the old woman, as Lucy threw herself in her lap, and hid her face upon her shoulder, clasping her neck. "Why, of course not, my own darling. Oh, what a baby it is! You're quite a bit of a girl still."

"But if I did turn all that was bad, and never came near dear old Auntie, you'd love me all the same? I know you would."

"Why of course I should, my pet," sobbed the old woman; and she began to rock her to and fro, as if expecting her to cry herself to sleep. "There, I've done. It's all right, Baby; we'll go to the race, and I hope he'll win after all."

"Ah!" cried Lucy joyfully. "And of course! Why the very thing!"

"What's of course, and the very thing?"

"Sandiwell Bay, Auntie."

"What about it?"

"There's a nice hotel there, and a pier and band, and it's only four miles from the race, and we'll drive over on the day, and we'll stop a week at the seaside."

"Lor', what a clever one you are, Baby; and how you do get over me! We will. I do reg'lar long for a sniff of the briny, as they say. But Sandiwell—is it a good place for s'rimps?"

"Sure to be, dear. But we should have to go to-day."

"To-day? Who's to pack up and go to-day?"

"I'll pack up, Auntie, and you shan't have a bit of trouble."

"But I ain't anything fit to go in, my dear."

"Stuff and nonsense, Auntie! You have heaps of things. There, don't you worry yourself about clothes. I'll see that our boxes are ready; and, Auntie, dear, I will be so good. I know it's all over now," she whispered, with a curious pinched look about her lips. "I shall never go back to him, because—because I can feel that he never really loved me as I did him."

"Never, my pet."

"But I can't help it, Auntie; it's life to me to try and hear about him, and no matter what he does, I want to see him sometimes."

"Ah, yes," said the old woman; "and as soon as he holds up his finger and beckons like, or chucks his hankychy like the sultan in the burlesque——"

"No, Auntie, no," said Lucy sadly; "it's all over; all past and gone."

"And you'll be sensible and wise?"

"Yes, Auntie; as wise as such a poor, weak, silly girl can be."

"And marry Mr. Daines?"

Poor Lucy Lee! She turned her pretty, piquante face with a wistful light in the eyes, a smile that was full of sadness on her lip, and a look that, in spite of her past, was pure womanly in its love and faith in the great mistake of her little life.

"No, Auntie dear," she said softly, "never—never. I like Mr. Daines, and, poor fellow, I know he loves me very dearly, but it's all killed, dear—it's quite dead. I shall never love anyone again—only you."

"Lucy, my precious," cried the old woman, beginning to sob, as she drew the frail little figure to her breast; "but I'm nearly done for now, and it will soon be me who is quite dead. What then?"

"What then, Auntie?" said Lucy, with a strange dreamy look in her eyes. "Do you remember coming down to the farm, to where there was a little girl in black, sitting crying on a stool, all alone and desolate in the empty home?"

"Remember it, my precious? Oh, so well—so well."

"And you took her in your lap, and put your dear, soft motherly arms round her."

"No, no, my darling, not motherly," sobbed Aunt Duncan; "I never had a bairn."

"Yes, dear, soft, motherly arms around me, and kissed me and told me not to fret—not to cry any more, for I was not left quite desolate, because you had come to fetch me, to take me to a happier home, where you would try to be a new mother to the poor miserable little orphan girl. You said you were a poor, fat, red-faced, ugly old woman."

"Did I say so, dear, did I?"

"Yes, Auntie. I remember every word."

"Well, my pet, it was quite true."

"But you didn't tell me you had a heart of gold—so full of love and tenderness for me that I have often wondered that I could ever go away from you as I did."

"That was only natur', my dear; you weren't to blame for that, though I will say it did seem 'ard."

"Yes, Auntie, but I did not know it then, for I was mad about him."

"Ah yes, my dear, and we all go mad like that, whether we're queens and duchesses, or only poor people who keep a shop."

"Yes, Aunt dear, I suppose so; and it isn't our fault."

"But I did try to be a mother to you, my dear, even if I have said 'ard words now and then."

"It did not take any trying, Auntie: you said you'd come to take me to a happier place, and when the time comes that you are going away, keep fast hold of my hand, dear, and let's go together, for I've no one else to live for now."

SHORT STORIES

No. 414.] For the Week ending Dec. 5th, 1896. [1d.

The Last Drummer.

After the passage of the Beresina by Marshal Victor, who, on the evening of the 28th of November, 1812, had lost so heavily in attacking the bridges, the fragments of the French army, having twice dispersed the Russian bands, were resting for a little in the suburbs of Smorgoni.

Two officers on horseback, wrapped in their cloaks, with heads bent low, were passing along the road.

"You say, Colonel, that there are many French in the rear, in spite of the butchery at the bridges?"

"There are thousands! Stragglers of every corps, lying in the snow, unarmed!"

"You should have rallied them!"

"I could not have carried ten thousand men in my holsters!"

"True! But you should have sounded the alarm!"

"The alarm—for dead men!"

There was a moment of silence.

"You know that he will review the Third to-morrow. Ney charged me to inform you. You will head the column."

The Colonel uttered a formidable laugh.

"A review of the Third Corps!"

He turned towards the General, who appeared impassive—and his gaiety at once subsided.

"You are jesting."

"Colonel Champeaux!"

EDITED BY C. Arthur Pearson

"By the sword of Jehovah!" cried the Colonel; "there is but one Emperor who can review those men!"

He lifted his arm in the darkness, with a vague gesture, towards Heaven.

"A review!" he went on; "but it will be a battalion review! The Third Corps numbered thirty-five thousand infantrymen and two thousand four hundred cavalrymen at the opening of the campaign; it had ten thousand, all told, on quitting Moscow. Do you know how many yet remain?"

He did not wait for the response.

"There remain one hundred and thirty. I say nothing of the horses. They have been digested! I—Colonel Champeaux—do you know how many men I myself have?"

"How many?"

"Seven; the remnant of a fine regiment of grenadiers."

The General shuddered, and his horse made a movement.

"How many wounded?"

"Six."

"Officers?"

"One, and the sole effective. I am he."

And the Colonel burst out laughing. It seemed a "good one."

"Very well," said the General. "This is the fourth. To-morrow, at nine o'clock, the Third Corps must be assembled. You must find these survivors."

The Colonel interrupted violently:

"Look out for an army corps—in this desert!"

"Bah!" said the General. "The Emperor wishes it. Understand, Champeaux, the Emperor!"

And he plunged into the darkness.

* * * * *

Champeaux, erect amidst the snow, reflected a moment, snapped his jaws together, and turned back towards the plain.

"The Emperor——"

This luminous word he passed again and again mechanically before his imagination.

"The Emperor—if it's the Emperor—all the same. If it be he——"

The French army was encamped in the midst of an immense circle of waggons and tethered horses, that is to say, in disorder. Bands of stragglers and wounded—the straying of the former and the creeping pace of the latter directed by chance—had assembled round thousand of fires, which they fed with rotted planks, tops of caissons, saddle-pads, and broken wheels. Everywhere was a shoreless sea of phantoms, with here and there, looming in the midst of it, a miserable shelter.

From time to time, the heavy, immense, indefinable breadth of the storm swept by; and again a terrific detonation was heard—a caisson of shells exploded!

Champeaux, savage and irresolute, made his way through the groups of shadows, cursed by those whose despondent reveries he disturbed.

"A review—an Imperial review! To-morrow! These carrion have no longer any uniform! How are corps of regiments to be recognised? Their only raiment is wounds, saddle-cloths, horse-blankets. Find the different battalions if you can!"

He grasped a shoulder at hazard.

"What regiment?"

The man was stretched out in sleep. He opened one eye; then closed it heavily.

Champeaux drew his sabre a little way from its scabbard, entered the edge of the fire, the flame licking his tall boots, and turned towards the men, whose blackened hands and arms were extended towards the coals, dripping as they thawed. They did not so much as look at him. But Champeaux was already roaring out the order of the Emperor. Immediately, when this name was pronounced, a few heads were lifted—the oldest—and twelve cavalry men of the Third Corps came and ranged themselves behind the Colonel.

"Have you your horses?"

The soldiers began to laugh softly, in the manner of young girls.

"Well, we will do without them," said the Colonel. "March!"

He went on. He and his men boldly entered the fire circles. Champeaux delivered the Emperor's orders, which, in proportion as the difficulties increased, he magnified by dint of vociferation, until it became a sort of proclamation to the troops. This reminder of Napoleon drew thirty men from the bivouac fires, of whom eight were grenadiers.

"Fall in!" said the Colonel.

As he moved forward, he stumbled upon the encumbent forms of men embedded in the ice. Then all would bend down and would loosen their stiffened forms, wrenching them from the ground as if they were so many sticks of timber. They planted them upright, and Champeaux, with a sort of congestive exaltation, bawled out his chant:

"Blockheads! It's for the Emperor!"

These words straightened them up as if Murat himself had grabbed them by the scruff of the neck, and they set forth, laughing. After four hours, the effective strength of the Third Corps reached eighty men.

Towards midnight recruiting became difficult. A black, bitter cold that would have frozen Vesuvius or the four ideas of a fever-ridden brain laid the men in heaps by the bivouac fires, even among the glowing embers, rolled, massed together, curled up like balls, heads and limbs confounded. To get them on their feet Champeaux, who now seemed transfigured, promised them the Cross! Twenty-nine arose. They were young; they were of the last conscription.

"Vive l'Autre!" (Long live the Other!) cried Champeaux. "Forward!"

But his horse would not budge. Prophetic, shuddering, steaming, its neck extended, its hoofs as if glued to the soil, it stood over the body of a sleeper, snorting and nibbling at the leather trappings.

"Who goes there?" growled Champeaux, bending so low that he seemed to be hanging from the saddle.

"No one goes," said one of the grenadiers of his following. "It's the skeleton of an artillery-man."

The man who lay there did not budge. The Colonel drew his sabre. Then a rugged head emerged from a mask of snow, and two clear eyes surveyed Champeaux's pelisse.

"What do you want with me?"

"Get up!"

The man grew angry. He believed they were joking.

"You there, take care—one step more and I will run you through the gullet, Colonel though you be!"

He said this at a single breath. Then, panting like a dumb brute, he fell back, exposing his body to view, from which a leg had been severed close to the trunk.

Champeaux made the round of two other bivouacs, and towards three o'clock, the troop numbering one hundred and twenty-five men, he despaired of finding the five others.

"We will return," he said.

They set out; but on the way the Colonel found a light infantryman beating his feet together between the shafts of a waggon, and scraping the ice from a piece of horse's leg.

"Follow us!" shouted the troop.

"I am not to be dist ırbed; I am dining," answered the spectre.

Champeaux raised one of his pistols, and the soldier sprang aside.

"Anyhow, let me get my drum!"

Champeaux did not stop him. He was struck by an idea which struck him to the very soul; he laid hold of the man.

"You are a drummer?"

"Yes."

He was a little fellow, without beard, slender, with hair like a child's.

"And you have kept your drum?"

"Here it is," said the conscript. "Why not? Since I am a drummer—I have my drum. If I hadn't my drum——"

Champeaux seized him, put him in the saddle, kissed him on both cheeks, as he would a woman. Alone in the midst of that agonised army which had abandoned its arms and insignia this child, who had guarded his drum, appeared to him a prodigy.

"Forward!"

They returned to the plain and sheltered themselves under the waggons.

Champeaux watched until morning.

* * * * *

Towards eight o'clock Napoleon appeared. He had just inspected certain corps, and had dictated the Twenty-ninth bulletin, by which France was startled and dumfoundered. Ney was at his side, Ledru des Essarts came in search of Champeaux.

"Come," said he.

The Emperor was on a slight eminence. The Third Corps, erect, drawn up four files deep, was posted a hundred yards away.

Champeaux, who was mounted, drew his sabre.

"Attention, my fine fellows," he said, in a subdued voice. "L'Autre vous regarde" (the Other is gazing at you). "Forward! Limber your legs! Tramp, I say. Make believe you are an army. Mar-r- r-r -rche!"

At once, more impetuous than a hunter's pack in full cry, with greater impulse, more ringing, more sonorous than the vanished bugles of the entire corps, there burst forth a terrible rann-plann-plann!—and those one hundred and twenty-five men, relics of the superb thirty-eight thousand of Elkingen, defiled before the cold gaze of the Emperor.

"Pann-rrrann! plann-plann!" chanted the drumsticks.

Four files front, accurate of step, elbows touching, heads thrown back, those human remnants crossed a corner of the plain, to the consecrated roll of the drum! Champeaux, with his sabre aloft as at the Carrousel, rode behind the little drummer.

This tragic parade, amidst the snow, amidst unequalled suffering, before a stupefied army, so shocked the stern old Marshal that—beside the impassive Napoleon—his knees trembled under him. They were without uniforms, those one hundred and twenty-five, but they had the noble mien of martyrs. Even the drummer was known as such only by the tragic fury of his rataplan!

"Pann! pann!" sounded the drum. "Plann! plann!"

At the head, as directed by the regulations, there were eight Grenadiers of the Guard, with chimerical faces, some topped with soiled caps, stained with the smoke of the battle and bivouac; others, a six-months' beard on their cheeks, with their heads thrust into tall cylinders of fur. And all were old, their bodies barred with solemn cicatrices.

"Prrann! pann! pann! rrrann—rrann—pan! pan! pan!"

The drummer wrought himself into a rage. sounding, beating, smiting his drum at the head of the column..

Next came sixty-eight light infantrymen, old, like the Grenadiers, one third of them in black gaiters and the others shod with strips of leather.

"Beware the Emperor!" cried Champeaux.

"Rrrann! plann! plann!—pataplann! plann! plann!"

Following, bareheaded, were two soldiers of the engineer corps, with neither sabres nor cartridge pouches frightfully slashed by the Cossacks, but still carrying their spades.

"Rrra-rra-rra-pataplann! paum! paum!" clamoured the tireless drummer.

Then appeared a disordered cavalry without horses, hobbling, limping along. but so proudly courageous that they would have retraced their steps on the instant and have reconquered the Russians; eight cuirassiers, without cuirasses, lifting towards the Emperor their seamed faces, the fur bands of the helmets tightened about their necks, the most of them clad in Russian pelisses, which they had won by dint of sword-play. One, an enormous fellow, had no trousers, and had tied a blue saddle-cloth about his thighs. He marched with bare ankles through the snow. Beside him trailed a dismounted dragoon, with a cap that had been shorn by musket-balls, hairless, plaqueless, without cordon or plume.

Bravely, drumsticks, rattle away! and you, drummer, roll, roll, for the tattered pandours of love!

"Rrrann! rrrann!—pataplann!"

Last, approached in four close lines, the artillerymen, fifteen in number, cannoniers of Piedmont, with neither white-looped cordons nor drumsticks; twelve dragoons, riddled with grape-shot, in bloody coats that once were green, striped like a tiger-skin with powder and rent with lance-thrusts, their silver dolmans flapping in formles tatters.

"Rrrann! rrrataplann!" Beat with your might; beat again, spare not, O drummer of Tabor! O death's drummer! "Pataplann; rrrataplann! plaum! plaum!"

"Don't look like sausages!" said Champeaux. "Yonder is the Emperor!"

Napoleon, in fact, erect upon his steed, unmoved and fatal as destiny, was awaiting them.

This knot of heroes, one of the few that remained of that great epic, defiled past him, their eyes turned towards his face. The drummer continued through the plain to beat his drum; the pitiful battalion followed him; and as if muffled in funereal crape, the rolling of the drum reverberated against the rigid walls of that imperial soul; already distant, becoming vaguer and vaguer, dying upon the ear, it seemed to the Emperor like the tolling of brazen tongues, announcing a foregone conclusion, the supreme alarm, the irremediable knell o his puissant armies.

GEORGE D'ESPARBES.

The Children's Benefit.

In the crude, half-formed world in which we live happiness must, to a great extent, be comparative, and the same rule holds good in regard to our creature comforts. We are never so comfortable, never so impregnated with cosiness as when the elements are waging their noisy warfare without, and when we may imagine how miserable we would be were we forced to brave the storm and endure the biting cold.

This was the case with the semicircle of men gathered round the fire roaring in the great chimney. Every snowcloud driving against the rattling windows increased their appreciation of the warmth and comforts of the room and caused them to turn with keener relish to the cheerful blaze. Every shrieking gust of wind lent to their minds a more delicate perception of the jests that fell from the lips of the celebrated comedian, Henry Leonard, who amused them, in varying degrees, by the reception of scraps of dialogue culled from the many comedies he had played in during his recent tour.

Leonard's personality contained, in a marked degree, that indescribable magnetic charm which enables every natural actor to control both the thoughts and emotions of his audience.

And with this charm was blended in happy proportion a fascinating versatility. Tragedy and comedy are near of kin all the world over; in Leonard they dwelt in amicable union. Grave or gay, he was a king among players, and could call forth either tears or laughter, according to his will.

In the midst of the hilarious burst of applause which greeted one of the actor's sallies, the door was timidly pushed open and a pair of ragged, half-frozen children stole into the room. With uncertain steps and eyes sharpened by cautious fear, they slowly made their way behind the laughing group, and presently stood by Leonard's side, rolling their frightened eyes about the room.

"Won't somebody give us some money? We have nothing to buy food with!" The little lad's teeth chattered with cold, and his blue lips were so stiff he could hardly frame his words; but he stood there before the men and, grasping his sister's hand tightly in his own, made his appeal with wistful eagerness.

"We don't want it for ourselves—we can starve—but father died last week and mother——" A sob cut his speech short; but bravely fighting back the tears that sprang to his eyes, he continued, huskily: "Mother will die, too, if we can get her no food; she is starving."

Nervously fingering his cap, he glanced from face to face with eyes full of pathetic entreaty. Then his lips began to tremble and hot tears rose to his eyes, as he saw nothing but coldness in the faces about him. Turning drearily away, he drew his sister towards the door, attempting to console her grief with brave words, although his own heart was almost breaking at the thought of the sweet face, all seamed with care, and hollow with hunger, so patiently awaiting their return.

"Won't you give us something, sir?" he asked, in a choked voice, extending his hands appealingly towards Leonard. "Mother is dying, sir; dying for want of food. Oh, do give us something!" The little fellow half-turned away and fell to sobbing as though his heart would break.

Tenderly the actor caught the ragged figure in his arms and put it in a chair. Then he turned and gazed fixedly on the silent men around him.

"Twenty years ago," he began abruptly, "my father lost his fortune, and we sank, almost in a day, from wealth to abject poverty. We scarcely had the necessaries of life, and were forced to see two delicately nurtured women who had been brought up in every luxury within the reach of wealth—two women who had been shielded by jealous love from every sorrow and guarded from every care—living out their lives in a foul and noisome tenement house. We were forced to drag them down with us to an existence more miserable than that of a beast. And these two women were my mother and my sister."

Leonard paused: his face looked pinched and drawn, his eyes glistened with unshed tears, and his voice shook with suppressed emotion.

"I was fifteen," he continued drearily, "old enough to appreciate their suffering, old enough to perceive that death, for my mother, at least, must follow in the footsteps of poverty.

"Ah! how brave they were! In their attempts to force upon my father and myself the belief that their lives were not the martyrdoms we knew them to be, they resorted to subterfuges that would have been pitiful had they not been beautiful—glorified by unselfish love. How often mother has met us at the door as we returned from our work and told us with loving words that she had chanced on some old-time friends and had dined elsewhere. She would smile as she told us that loving falsehood, and, although she had not tasted food in God knows how long, she would strive to force her portion of the scanty meal upon us."

Leonard's voice broke and he turned his face, twitching with pain, from his staring auditors. None were apathetic now, and tears of pity were hanging in many of the eyes fastened on the figure before the fire.

"One day my father was brought home crippled for life," Leonard continued dully. "I, a boy of fifteen, was the only one left to earn bread to fill those three mouths. I worked both night and day, I worked as a man never worked before; but what could my earnings avail among so many? Day by day I saw my mother growing paler: great blue hollows appeared beneath her eyes, and each hour left her thinner and weaker than the last.

"My God! she was starving to death before my eyes and I was powerless to save her!"

Leonard sprang up and paced the floor with feverish, uneven strides.

"Hell can hold no torture to equal what I suffered then, heaven no joy to compensate it. Both father and mother died when a crumb from a rich man's pocket, a crumb too small to be noticed by him, would have saved them."

He buried his face in his hands, and dry, hard sobs shook him from head to foot.

When he turned again to his auditors, his appearance had undergone a complete change. His figure, as he crouched before the fire, looked pinched and small, his clothes seemed to hang in folds from his shoulders, his cheeks were hollow, and his whole figure shivered with cold.

"And now, my sister, all that is left to me in the world is dying, starving before my eyes!" he cried shrilly, his glittering eyes full of wild appeal. "I have sought work in every quarter; I have gone into the streets and begged alms in the name of the God above us, and I have failed to get anything. Do you hear? Failed! O, can there be a merciful God above us, when I am forced to see her die like this?

"For the love of that God! For the love of all you hold dearest, give me something!" he pleaded wildly stretching hands that shook with emotion appealingly towards the silent group.

"You are rich; you would not miss so small a sum, and you can save her—save my sweet sister! For God's sake do not leave her to starve to death!" His face aflame with passionate entreaty, Leonard sprang up and moved among the spectators, holding a hat in his hand.

All, stirred to the depths of their hearts, strove to give vent to their emotions in the magnitude of their offerings, and Leonard returned to his seat by the fire, his hat overflowing with bank-notes.

"Thanks, gentlemen," he said quietly.

He turned to look for the children, and, to his surprise, found the little pair at his elbow with tears shining in their eyes.

"What is the matter?" he asked softly.

"We're so sorry for you, sir," the boy answered huskily; "and we want to give you this for your sister. 'Tain't much, but it's all we have, and we want you to take it, 'cause, I guess, you want it more'n we do; and, besides, we can get a couple more before we get home." The boy eagerly pushed two pennies into the actor's hand, his face bright with pleasure at giving.

"This, gentlemen, is charity," Leonard said gravely. Then, turning to the boy, he placed the money in his hand and told him to hasten home to his mother.

"But it's for your sister," the little lad said stoutly, although his eyes glistened at sight of the collection.

"I have no sister," the actor answered, smiling.

"And you ain't poor?" asked the puzzled urchin.

"No." The actor rose, and walking to the door, sent the children on their way rejoicing.

"That was very fair," he said, as he reseated himself.

"Your story was not true, I gather from what you told the boy," a spectator said.

"No," answered Leonard, lazily lighting a cigarette, "merely a bit of original tragedy for the sake of the children."

My Fellow Voyager

An Amateur Aeronaut's Adventure.

"Yes, Ned, it's the only way to save me. It's my bread, the balloon is, and they'll make no more of ripping the Defiance to ribbons than I should of chipping the shell of an egg at breakfast, those peppery Marseillais!"

The situation was, to say the least of it, exceedingly awkward. It was the evening of a fête day, in brilliant, sultry autumn weather, such as may be looked for in the south of France; and the Ducasse, or local festival of St. Maure, a village lying on the coast some two leagues eastward of Marseilles, had drawn thither a swarm of the population of the old Phocæan city.

There was dancing in progress—the merry sound of the fiddles floating upward through the vine tendrils that hung across the open window reached my ears as I stood beside the bed—but the great attraction of the evening's entertainment was to be a balloon ascent, in the midst of fireworks, on the part of an English aeronaut, who, in the glowing language of the hand-bills and posters that had for ten days past advertised the trip, was described as "The Famous, the Intrepid Oliver Killick, the King of the Air."

As for myself, I was simply a young artist, Edward Holmes by name, not long since returned from a protracted course of art study in Rome, and who found it hard enough, by touching up photographs, "finishing" the sketches of amateurs, and taking, at the lowest rate of remuneration, the portrait of whoever favoured me with a sitting, to procure the wherewithal to live.

I had been accidentally thrown a good deal in the company of Killick, who had for some time been exhibiting his balloon in various towns of the South, and who had shown me some kindness, as a fellow-countryman; while I, on my part, had a regard for the old man, whose quaint anecdotes of his experience as a travelling balloonist were often amusing.

And now a serious difficulty had, at the last moment, arisen. There, in the garden of the village inn, fenced off by ropes and stakes from the pressure of the crowd that surged around, was the Defiance, fully inflated, straining at the cords that fastened it to the earth, and ready for use, while on his bed lay the unlucky "King of the Air," groaning and disabled.

He had sent for me to visit in his room shortly after the occurrence of the accident—a stumble over a loose plank and a fall downstairs—and though I sympathised with him sincerely, I had been quite at a loss for an expedient. Killick was a heavy, elderly man, and in his fall had severely sprained his right wrist and injured his thumb, besides receiving a cut on the left temple.

"That's nothing," he said half querulously, as I examined the hurt; "I've had worse in touching the ground many's the day. It's the thumb that's the matter—the thumb and the wrist. I can't handle the valve-ropes with this crippled arm any more than a school-girl could do it. And what's to happen now?"

My first idea was that the accident, and all the consequent inability of the balloonist to give the promised exhibition, should be announced, and an apology made to the public; but the veteran decidedly negatived this apparently obvious proceeding.

He reminded me of the irascible character of a mob everywhere, and above all of a southern French mob, and assured me of what I could readily believe, that no excuse would be accepted by the fiery Marseillais, baulked of the long-looked-for treat of an ascent; they would certainly destroy the balloon, and not improbably offer violence to the aeronaut.

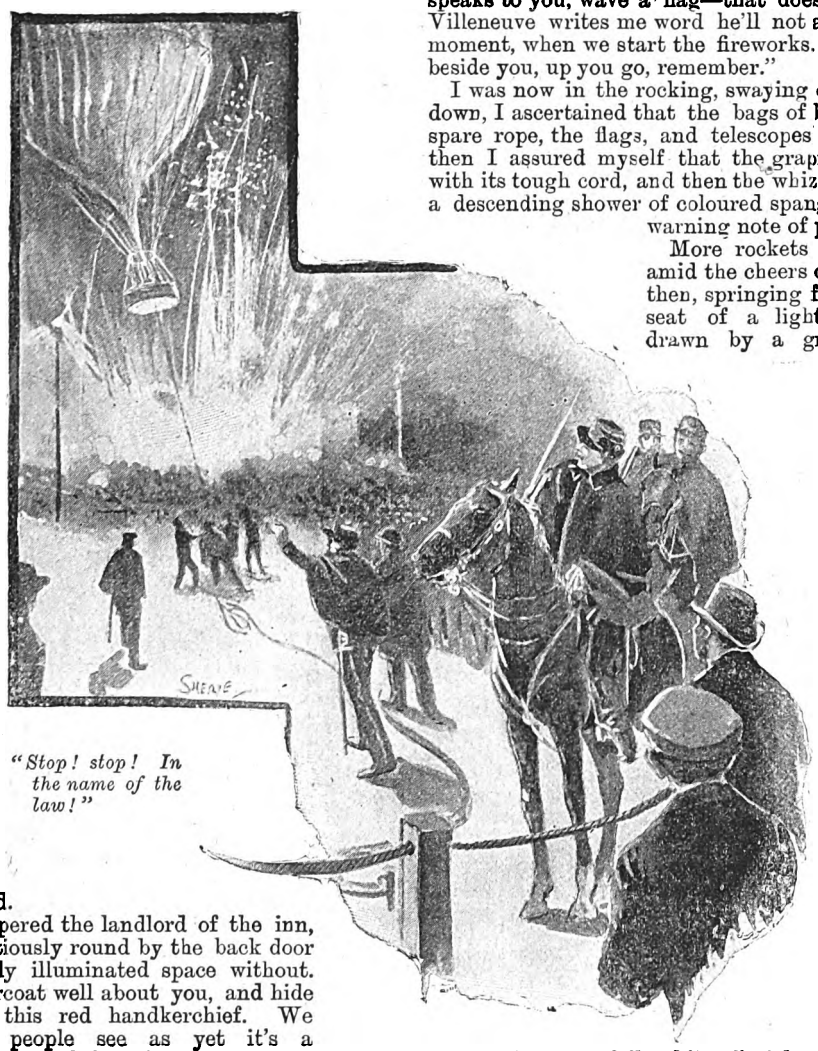
The very loss of the Defiance would be a serious disaster to its owner. Then, too, a rich landed proprietor of the neighbourhood—a vain young man, with a taste for notoriety—had offered fifteen louis d'or to be taken up as a passenger; and to disappoint M. Victor de Villeneuve, and lose three hundred francs, was also an unwelcome contingency.

To my surprise, Killick proposed that I should go up in his stead, and undertake for the occasion the office of aeronaut. I had indeed accompanied him, while we were both at Nice, in two short ascents, and had learnt from him how to manage the valves and ballast—the rudiments of the art of ballooning.

I was young, active, had a steady head, and the owner of the Defiance was quite willing to intrust her to me, if I would but so far oblige him. Perhaps the novelty of the notion, acting on a somewhat adventurous fancy, made me yield the more readily to the old man's entreaty. I said "Yes," and was held to my word.



"Stop! stop! In the name of the law!"

"Come," whispered the landlord of the inn, as he led me cautiously round by the back door into the partially illuminated space without. "Wrap your overcoat well about you, and hide your face with this red handkerchief. We musn't let the people see as yet it's a raw hand that's to go aloft. Once up, you can laugh it off."

This was all very well for the innkeeper, whose only wish was to keep the rabble in good humour, and avoid a riot, which might lead to the pillage of his cellar and the demolition of his furniture; but I began inwardly to question the wisdom of my own choice.

However, it was too late to withdraw. One glance at the sea of keen, olive-complexioned faces, the flashing eyes and impassioned gestures of the spectators, was enough to show the risk that would attend the giving of wilful offence. They were gay enough, laughing blithely, but it would not have required much to arouse them to any violence.

There was the Defiance, majestically poised above the ground like a vessel riding at anchor. There was nothing for it but to carry out, as best I might, the madcap enterprise on which I had embarked.

"You had better get into the car, and be ready," said the landlord, still in an undertone, as he passed me through the cordon of police that kept back the foremost of the spectators. "Don't talk; but if anybody speaks to you, wave a flag—that does as well. M. de Villeneuve writes me word he'll not arrive till the last moment, when we start the fireworks. As soon as he's beside you, up you go, remember."

I was now in the rocking, swaying car, and, stooping down, I ascertained that the bags of ballast, the coil of spare rope, the flags, and telescopes were at my feet; then I assured myself that the grapnel was provided with its tough cord, and then the whizz of a rocket, and a descending shower of coloured spangles of fire, gave a warning note of preparation.

More rockets now soared aloft, amid the cheers of the crowd, and then, springing from the driving-seat of a light open carriage, drawn by a grey horse, there appeared a stout, well-dressed man, who elbowed his way so quickly through the throng that I had scarcely time to conjecture that this must be the volunteer companion of my aerial voyage, M. Victor de Villeneuve, before he scrambled into the car, and was at my side.

"Let go, boys!" he cried in a sharp, imperious tone, to the men who held the ropes. "Let go the ropes! Do you hear?"

A voice raised in accents of command seldom fails of its effect, however questionable may be the right of him who speaks, and the men addressed, in their astonishment, mechanically obeyed. The balloon rose a little, nothing now restraining its upward flight save the trigger cord, firmly moored to a post below, the spring being in my grasp.

"Well, comrade, off we go!" exclaimed the passenger, with a jovial laugh that had scarcely the ring of honest mirth in it.

Perhaps M. de Villeneuve, for all his swaggering deportment, was ill at ease as to the results of our voyage, and strove to carry it off gaily. Such were my thoughts as the catherine-wheels began to revolve in cascades of whirling fire, and the crowd to cheer. It was the moment for our start; but I hesitated to pull the trigger, for now a strange bustle and confusion below attracted my attention.

A mounted gendarme, his sabre and carbine clanking, had ridden up at the full gallop of his reeking horse, followed at some distance by three others, who spurred furiously forward. There were a few hurried questions, then a smothered outcry, a roar of voices, and a swaying backward and forward of the excited populace.

I looked down at the crowd of upturned faces.

"Stop! stop! In the name of the law!" cried out the brigadier of the foot-police.

"Let go, fool!" thundered the man who sat beside me in the car.

"But it is the police that——" I began, thinking that M. de Villeneuve had suddenly taken leave of his senses.

"Come down! stop—haul the rope!" was the shout from below; but as the words reached my ear, my companion bent forward. Something flashed in his hand —a knife—the cord was cut, and the balloon started upwards.

"In the name of the law, stop—ah! you won't? Here goes then!" cried a gendarme, discharging his carbine, an example that was followed by his comrades; but the balls whistled idly by, while we rose and rose until the inn and the gardens, and the shouting crowd, and the spluttering fireworks had diminished to pigmy size, and presently disappeared altogether; and the balloon rode on, solitary, through the air.

"Aha!" said M. de Villeneuve, with a chuckle that was incomprehensible to me. "A singular salute our friends gave us—eh, when they bade us bon voyage?"

The moon, half-full, had now risen, and I could see the face of my companion—the swarthy, keen face of a man forty years of age, with short, dark hair, slightly grizzled, fiery black eyes, and very white, strong, sharp-pointed teeth, which gave him, when he smiled, somewhat the expression of a laughing wolf. He was a man of powerful frame, and the fingers of the gloved hand which he now laid upon my arm were as strong as steel.

"Well," said the strange passenger, with a grin that an ogre might have envied, "you take me for a queer specimen of the French provencial gentry—eh? But first, how comes it that Killick is absent, and a youngster of your age has the honour to be my pilot?"

I told him briefly, and in offended tones, what had occurred, and how it was that he and I found ourselves together so far above terra firma, at the same time cautioning him not, as he had done before, to take it on himself to interfere with the management of the balloon.

"We must now," I added, "look out for a place to descend, for the wind is freshening, and——"

"Let it freshen!" rudely interrupted M. de Villeneuve. "Sets fair for Spain, does it not?"

"For Spain?" I echoed, in surprise. Could this self-conceited country gentleman really imagine that we were bound on such a journey as that? I could not help laughing, as I said: "Why for Spain, monsieur?"

"Well, Italy would have served me as well, had the wind been a westerly one. I talk both languages, and know the wine-houses in Cadiz as well as I do those of Genoa," answered M. de Villeneuve, again chuckling. "What are you doing with that rope?"

"I am opening the valve above," I answered coldly, "because it is time now to sink to a lower level, and descend——"

"Descend, eh," briskly put in my fellow-voyager. "We may as well understand each other at once. Hands off the rope, I say, if you would keep the roof on your skull," he added threateningly, as he drew a revolver from his pocket, and deliberately pointed the barrel at my head. "I'll show you who's captain up here!"

My blood ran cold as the horrible thought flashed upon me that I was, at that fearful height above the earth, in company with a madman. Nothing, surely, save insanity, could account for the extraordinary behaviour of M. de Villeneuve?

But I suppose I put a tolerably good countenance on the matter, for my formidable companion laughed again, but less ill-naturedly, as he said:

"You face it out well. I like a youngster who shows a heart somewhat bigger than a chicken's. And I'm not so bad as I look—never do this!"—he drew his hand as he spoke, edgeways, with a meaning gesture, across his throat—"when I can get my profits by quieter means. But you stare at me as if I were a mountebank selling quack medicines. Can you guess why those gendarmes were so peremptory an hour ago? Because they wanted the pleasure of my company back to Toulon, that's all. Did you never hear of Casse-tête?"

"Casse-tête?" I repeated in perplexity.

"Yes, Pierre Paul Grincheux, if you please, alias Casse-tête," said the man, with an odd sort of pride. "It's a name, if you read the reports of our tribunals, that you may have met with. Toulon, Brest, Lambessa—I know every one of those charming retreats. I have had enough sea-air for a while, so I gave myself leave of absence."

And then I remembered to have seen a paragraph in a local paper announcing the escape from Toulon of a criminal of the most dangerous type, who had not yet been recaptured, and whose grotesque nickname was Casse-tête. And here was I, voyaging by night in a balloon, in company with a runaway galley-slave, well armed with knife and pistol, and more than a match in strength for me, even had he been less well provided with weapons.

My terrible companion was only too much disposed to be talkative; and as we swept onward before the freshening wind, he was kind enough to favour me with a few brief anecdotes of his past career, in which the jocose and horrible seemed to mingle in cynical confusion. The one point on which he was uncommunicative was the manner of his recent escape from Toulon; or how—probably owing to the complicity of others—he became possessed of his weapons. But he told graphically of the ten days of hardship and hunger which he had endured while skulking among the rocky hills by night, and lying hidden among thorny brakes by day, until at last he broke into a pæan of triumph in relating how he had encountered and robbed the true M. de Villeneuve on his way to the village fête.

"Twenty shining naps in his purse!" he said exultingly, "and three thousand francs besides in notes. Well, I left him gagged and bound to a tree, after I had taken the freedom to change clothes with him; and there he stands, no doubt, trembling, but fortunate to keep a whole skin. And I found in his pocket the letter of M. Killick, promising to take him as a passenger in the balloon here, and so——"

And so the idea had presented itself to this daring and ready-witted ruffian to personate the victim of his recent robbery, and thus to procure the means of flight in what was certainly an unexampled fashion, while I was the luckless scapegoat of his audacious enterprise. Meanwhile the wind, as I have said, was rising, and as we hurried on I looked downward, and saw, by the shimmer of the moonlight on the tremulous waves, that the sea was below us. I could not forbear an exclamation of dismay.

The desperado at my side also looked down.

"Bah! sea or land! what matters it?" he said recklessly. "Throw out ballast—do you hear me?" and I complied.

The lightning sent its flaming arrows across the darkening sky.

The balloon instantly rose, and it presently became perceptibly colder, so that I shivered, and had to chafe my hands together to prevent them from stiffening My companion's iron frame showed no signs of suffering from the abrupt lowering of the temperature; but after a time the Defiance seemed to be nearer to the sea, for I heard the low roar of the waves; and then Casse-tête impatiently flung out another bag of ballast, and we rose.

My recollections of the voyage of that miserable night spent thus, and in such company, are vague. I suffered from cold and fatigue, and mechanically I obeyed the directions of the escaped galley-slave, who had now assumed the command. There was no doubt about the fixity of his determination to continue the desperate flight until we should be across the French frontier. How long our aerial journey might prove, undertaken as it was without warm clothing, provisions, or brandy, I could not conjecture, while it was certain that we were hurrying along with great velocity—how swiftly I had no means of calculating—before the wind.

So far as I could tell, the direction of the wind was uniform—steadily from north-east by east. The sea which I had seen beneath us was, no doubt, a part of the gulf, lying somewhere between the mouths of the river Rhone and the Spanish border, but the remainder of our route was, in theory, mere guess work.

A slight shift in the wind might cause us to be carried out into the broad Mediterranean. We might even drift beyond the Straits, into the broader Atlantic to perish, as many a balloon voyager has died, without a record of his fate. Where we were I could not tell. The dark, blurred outline of what lay beneath seemed to indicate hills and woods, not sea.

"If we come down in France, my young friend," said the strident voice of the escaped convict, as we floated through masses of misty vapour, which wetted me to the skin, "you may bid adieu to the world. It is no fault of yours, you will say, if the wind carries this flapping gas-bag to Poitous or the Nivernais. No; but is Casse-tête to wait while you crawl to the nearest brigade of gendarmerie to give notice that your fellow-traveller was Pierre Paul Grincheux, an escaped gaol-bird? No, thank you! So sure as we drop on French soil, with the Official Journal posted on the walls of the Poste de Police, I prove that one can keep a secret better than two."

I am not unduly timorous, but my heart sank within me as I heard these words, uttered with an emphatic ferocity which left no doubt of the speaker's sinister meaning. I fully made up my mind, should the desperado at my side attempt to realise his threats, that I would not be by any means passive in the struggle; but his weapons and his strength left little hope of a satisfactory ending to such a contest.

"There's something wrong with the valves," said my companion roughly, an hour later. "The gas is escaping, and we are sinking. You, aeronaut, must ascend the netting and stop the flow of the gas."

I was very reluctant to obey. To climb the netting of a balloon, when at a great height above the earth, is never a very pleasant task; but to do so, leaving behind me a ruffian who might at any moment shoot or stab me as I descended, thus relieving himself from an inconvenient witness, was indeed irksome. However, Casse-tête evinced such pertinacity, and swore so many grisly oaths, that at last I complied; and having adjusted the valve, crept back to the car, sick and giddy, but unhurt.

The moon had faded away. There were pale, crimson streaks in what I took to be the eastern sky, and below lay piled up gloomy masses of black cloud, through which gleamed at intervals something white and lustrous, like the marble pinnacles of the cathedral at Milan.

"We're steering straight. Fate, for once, befriends me!" exclaimed the sharer of my journey, "for those are the peaks of the eastern Pyrenees. Throw out ballast! Don't let us ground on them."

We were, in reality, floating among the serrated summits and white, snow-clad cones of the chain of mountains that forms a natural barrier between France and Spain. Below, the sullen cloud-banks menaced elemental war, and already low, muttering growls of thunder reverberated among the ridges beneath us.

"Throw over more ballast!" commanded my ruffianly companion.

I flung out, with some misgivings, the remainder of the last bag of sand and small pebbles, but the Defiance did nor rise with its former buoyancy. Much gas had been lost. The once smooth surface of the silk, painted in gaudy stripes of pink and blue, was wrinkled now, and fluttered loosely in irregular festoons. More than once it seemed as though we must be dashed against some one of the towering peaks above which the balloon slowly revolved.

I awoke to find myself lying upon a truckle-bed.

Crash after crash, peal upon peal, rang out the deep diapason of the thunder, echoed from glen to glen and from ridge to ridge, while far and wide the lightning sent its flaming arrows across the darkening sky. How strange it was to see around us those forked shafts of dazzling light, to hear from beneath us those awful rolls of heaven's terrible artillery, and to float helplessly above the raging tempest!

Day had broken; the sun was rising, red and angry, in the stormy eastern sky, and as a current of air wafted the balloon forward, I could dimly distinguish forest and meadow, and spurs of wood-clothed hills, lying to the southward of us. The snowy peaks, rosy-pink in the morning radiance, were being gradually left behind us, as we glided through the air.

"Hurrah!" cried out the galley-slave triumphantly, as he scanned the landscape. "We're well across the frontier now, and Pierre Paul Grincheux is safe from the chain-gang. Thank your stars——"

A stunning peal of thunder cut short his boastful discourse, and as it did so the Defiance heeled over, and was driven like a dead leaf before the gale, by the sudden rush of a mighty wind, that bore us almost to the surface of the ground, and hurried us along with headlong rapidity. Fields, woodlands, houses, seemed to pass us with feverish haste, and still we sped onward, so near now to the earth that I momentarily expected that we should become entangled among the trees that loomed so near us.

What was that, like a river of dancing water, on the dusty high road beneath us, the yellow road like a ribbon winding amid the rocks and thickets? Troops on the march, no doubt, the sunlight glinting on their bayonets. I could see that as we approached they came confusedly to a halt.

"Again, hurrah!" shouted the galley-slave. "A cheer, noble Spaniard, for your guest, Pierre Paul, now safely——"

As he spoke, I saw the earth very near us, saw the soldiers run to right and left, as though to clear the way for our passage, and then, with a sickening crash, the balloon and the car seemed to strike against a rock, thousands of sparks of fire filled my bewildered eyes, and then all grew dark.

* * * * *

"He'll live, never fear!" said a cheery voice, speaking in Spanish language, which I imperfectly understood, as I awoke to find myself lying upon a truckle-bed in a wayside cottage, surrounded by a group of officers, while a regimental surgeon was feeling my pulse. "Give him a few more drops of the brandy! Only a couple of ribs the worse, I think."

"And—and the man who was with me?" I asked feebly.

The doctor shook his head.

"Not your father or brother, I trust, sir?" he said. "Ah! then, I may tell you that his head was dashed against the rock, and his neck—a tough one, by-the-bye—very effectually dislocated."

And so it was. Casse-tête, who had broken many other heads, had finally broken his own.

Strange to say, my fortune was, to a qualified extent, made by the accident which had so nearly put an end altogether to my worldly anxieties. The kind protectors who had picked me up, a wayworn stranger, with two ribs broken, by the wayside, had conveyed me along with them on a litter to the garrison town of Girona, whither they were bound, and in the military hospital of this place I was cared for until youth and a robust constitution enabled me to get the better of the fever that ensued.

My strange story was noised abroad, and all Barcelona seemed eager to sit for its portrait to the young artist who had visited Spain in so singular a manner. Thence, with good professional recommendations, I passed on to Madrid, Paris and London, and have never since known the actual pressure of want.

I afterwards heard that a subscription set on foot at Marseilles compensated Killick for the loss of his balloon, but he and I never met again. H. Rogerson.

A PRODUCTION OF UNRIVALLED INTEREST.

It tells of the marvellous discovery of an Eastern Professor, which outdistances the Röntgen Rays as they outdistance photography. The fame of the Electric Eye will soon ring through the world. With it we shall see through stone walls and brick-built houses as clearly as we now see through a pane of glass. The Editor of Pearson's Magazine has obtained the first account which Dr. Bose—the modern miracle-worker, who has elaborated the Electric Eye—has allowed to be published. The contribution is no fairy tale. Dr. Bose's achievements are regarded with amazement by the foremost scientists of the day. Lord Kelvin, for example, writes of them:

of a Coloured Plate now when so many are, or are about to be, before the public, but a Chromo-Lithographic Picture, which forms part of THE CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER OF PEARSON'S MAGAZINE, is stated by competent judges who have seen it to be the finest piece of colour printing which has ever been turned out in England. The work is so good that it might be French—and higher praise than that cannot be bestowed upon colour printing—but it is done by an English firm.

THE DECISION OF CLYDE.

WHEN Brooke Clyde found himself in love with a woman whom he had no desire to marry, he wisely packed up his paint brushes and general utility clothes and fled her presence.

It was easier to do this because it was June, and the streets of the city were hot, and spoke with dusty throats of greenness and freshness elsewhere. The woman, for her part, took his desertion lightly. She had loved many times, but not much.

She had perennial consolation within herself, the forces of her nature finding vent sometimes in experimental romance, sometimes in a kind of intellectual greed.

A volume of clever stories, which had come in the same post, overshadowed Clyde's note of farewell.

He went to the seaside, and tried to convince himself that a world of women was not worth one glimpse of the ocean melting into the sky. He sought to put his soul—he knew he had one—into certain shades and combinations of blues and greys and greens.

So much for the artist.

The man was restless.

"That woman has force enough to upset my life, but not force enough to steady it," he said to himself, half angry because she looked at him from his canvas and obscured the picture that was forming there.

"I will write to her," he thought, piqued by some conjecture that she might not be taking his absence seriously. "That will impress her." A few days later he had an adventure. Then he said: "Now I have an excuse for writing—about another woman."

This is what he wrote:

"The church is noted hereabouts. It is old enough to be a part of the soil on which it stands. It is ivy-covered, of course. The sea wind rushes through its belfry and stirs its ancient bell. Its door is always open, to invite the worshipper—who never comes. Only artists come, and they say no prayers. Its altar is fresh with flowers—she places them there. An image of Christ is in the east window. He walks upon the sea, with one hand outstretched to save those whom the great depth might swallow up. I tell you of the church, because the church explains the verger's daughter.

"I wonder if you, a woman of the world, could understand this girl? Her father, as I found, actually a gentleman, who cast away Heaven knows what wrecks of a past life to hide himself in a verger's gown. The aroma of experience in a larger world still clings to him. I hoped that the secret might escape from between the covers of the books in his library. But no more of him. It is a shadowy paternity, fitting a girl who lives in the shadows.

"She is all faith, and no experience. The sea has moulded her thoughts, and the church has coloured her emotions. When I first saw her, she was placing flowers from her garden, a step beyond the mouldy tombstones, on the altar. There was something mediæval in the devoutness of the act.

"'Here is pure Gothic embodied,' I said, as I watched her, looking up furtively from my drawing of the chancel. Later I saw her swimming in the ocean—joy and energy in every limb, and was glad that the impression of the morning was partially wiped out. Hope she may not escape from this world until she has tasted some of its fierce joys. Maybe, one day, when the summer sun lies hot and golden on her flower-beds, she will feel the blood dance in her veins, and say with the Lady of Shalot, 'I am half sick of shadows.'

"Then she will put the flowers in her hair, instead of on the altar, and find out that she is very, very beautiful."

The Woman of the World answered in three lines:

"You are poetical. Tell me more about this girl whose face pleases you. Have you spoken with her, or is speech sacrilege?"

He wrote again:

"I speak with her daily. She listens and answers me through organ notes. I sit in the church while she makes music, always with its undertone of immaturity. Sometimes I sketch her, now as St. Cecilia, now as a sea syren. As the latter she is always a failure. Her face is innocent of the syren. She will never know how to make a man love her, unless I teach her."

The Woman of the World frowned over this last sentence.

She answered immediately:

"I do not wish to overvalue or undervalue your talents as a schoolmaster, but I know that one half-god can represent Olympus to a girl who knows her prayer-book better than she knows men. Let her be, and come back to that much misunderstood sisterhood, Women of the World. You will only disturb her, and then go away, while she, she stays—that kind of woman always stays—in the old places vocal with his voice and warm with his presence, and she tries to comfort herself with these ghosts of light and sound, until she becomes dyspeptic from over-much dreaming and too little healthy appetite for her actual surroundings.

"Remember, I love the verger's daughter so much that I dare say to you that you could never make her happy."

"But she can make me happy," he answered, "which is more to the point. Only think! she had never heard of Ibsen or of 'Christian Science,' though she reads both Greek and Latin, and loves her Shakespeare and her Milton.

"You need not be disturbed. My teachings are purely intellectual—addressed with austere singleness of purpose to the child's mind, which is highly sensitive, and utterly uncramped by that strait-jacket—modern education. She knew nothing of the modern warfare between science and religion Now she looks embarrassed when the service is read of a Sunday, where before she looked devout.

"I told her of you one day, and of your clever article in the Exodus Quarterly on the connection between miracles and superstition. She was curious to know more about you, and I noticed that she laid more stress on your personal charms than on your intellectual qualities. When I had carefully given her a synopsis of that more than happy article of yours, she said:

"'Is she pretty?'

"What does that mean?"

The Women of the World wrote thus:

"When she is no longer the verger's daughter, with a prayer in her eyes and Gregorian chant music in her finger-tips, you will cease to care for her. How like a man! to kill the charm for love of the butchery. Why make her like us? If we no longer see visions and dream dreams, why should you turn the electric light on her simple faith? I am ashamed of you, Brooke Clyde!"

He did not answer her letter for several weeks. Then he wrote:

"Since you found fault with one kind of schooling, I tried another, more to test my powers of—hypnotism, you would call it, than to build up a romance. I have succeeded in making the girl love me, not by making love to her, oh no! that is a very old-fashioned and clumsy method, but by simply bringing into prominence everything in my character that would be mystifying or unintelligible to her—the mysterious is always fascinating—so I turned myself into a sealed book which might hold a fairy tale or a philosophical treatise between the non-committal covers.

"The result justified the sweet reasonableness of the method.

"Of course she says nothing, but the child is alabaster—to be trite, all the love-light of her heart shines through her face. She never looks at the altar now, only at me, a poor but more human substitute for her devotion.

"We were in the churchyard at sunset, standing near the west door of the church with its sombre frame of ivy. She was in white, and the sun had somehow stolen into her hair, and into the diaphanous folds of her dress, and the light seemed to come from her, herself.

"I asked her to stand just so, against the black oak door, while I sketched her. She did as she was told, with that sweet obedience to my every wish which sometimes charms me, and sometimes makes me impatient—and while she stood there, swaying a little, like a flower when the air stirs, I told her an old German story of a knight who loved a lady, plighted his truth with her, and then rode away to the wars with her token on his breast.

"The war burns itself out, and after many years he comes riding wearily home, her token still on his breast, and a doubt like a snake in his heart lest she should not have remained faithful. Suddenly he sees her by the roadside, straining her eyes to catch the first glimpse of her beloved. She does not recognise him, and before he can call her name she cries out for news of her lover. To test her to the utmost, he replies that he was not slain, but is alive and well indeed, having married a women in the foreign country.

"'God bless him, whatever he has done,' cries the mediæval lady.

"I can hear you say 'Poor fool—a German Hausfrau,' but the child's eyes suddenly became the home of all the love and romance in the world, and she said, with a tremble in her voice:

"'How privileged she was to have such a test!'

"An ugly imp of irritation suddenly took possession of me. I put aside the sketch, and haven't yet finished it. I could have heaven for the asking, and yet I am ungrateful.

"As she said 'Good-night,' she looked at me with an all-unfolding look of love. How the gods work us mortals!"

Her next letter came promptly:

"This place is looking wonderfully well for the last of July, and justifies its reputation as a monstrous seaside resort. The park is still green as emerald, the libraries are full of cool, pensive shadows, the strangers in town are worth studying. By-the-way, I've formed a summer saloon of choice spirits, who meet of evenings to drink lemonade and claret, and incidentally to bare their souls to each other in a new sonnet or an unpublished sonata. We invoke the Muses till twelve, and then steal home with a delicious sense of having a great city to ourselves just because some acknowledged peers are out of it. No, a notable exception, Bayard Keith arrived last week from Italy. He is even more entertaining than his new book, which promises to be his best. He is reading it to me. We look forward to welcoming you back in October."

He answered her letter with a telegram:

"Will arrive in town Thursday afternoon. Must see you Thursday evening."

The Woman of the World awaited his coming in her parlour. The room without her would have been eloquent of the many elements which make up the artistic side of life in a great social centre. As it was, it faded into a quiet background for her. She seemed to absorb and express its charm.

His telegram lay on the table. The imperative "must" had told her the whole story in its past, present, and future tense.

When he came she welcomed him as if he had parted from her the day before. She began a conversation innocent of subtleties. He was uneasy under it, and broke in upon her flow of words at last, as if he did not hear them.

"You do not ask me why I left my sea-shore paradise and hurried back to town on the crest of a hot wave."

"I am never curious about people's motives," she said. "They are too much a part of character ever to be perfectly understood, and artists are privileged creatures. They are not obliged to have motives."

"I have a motive—the strongest of my life," he answered curtly. He was looking at her from under half-lowered eyelids, and was thinking that he had made a most judicious decision, a kind of precious crystal evolved from the hot jealousy provoked by her last letter. Her indifference, her languid attitude, the studied intellectual beauty of her evening gown, seemed fine wine to him after too long a draught of spring water.

"The strongest motive of my life," he repeated. "I love you, you only! I ask you to be my wife."

She looked a courteous interest in what he said, as if it concerned anyone but herself.

"You do not answer me. I did not think you the woman to enjoy entreaties."

"You are right in that. You shall have your answer. I cannot marry you."

"And why not?"

"I would never marry a man who preferred me to a verger's daughter."

A ROMANCE OF ACADIA.

There is a village on a point of land in Acadia that runs out between two bodies of water. On one side is the harbour, called, like the settlement itself, Leboncoup; on the other, the bay, which flows from the ocean past the point for many miles, and is dotted throughout its length with more than three hundred fir-clad islands. This was appropriately called by the French, Baie des Iles, which in English speech became corrupted into Eel Bay, as it is now known.

Two years after the expulsion from Grand Prè, the French settlers were driven from this point and carried, like the exiles from the valley, to the neighbouring colonies, whence they returned twelve years later to the sterile point which had been their home. Here they found the clearings made by their fathers at the head and east side of their pretty harbour adopted by English settlers, and they gathered upon the unbroken, forest-clad west shore to begin a third Leboncoup, which should be purely French Acadian. All this happened a hundred and twenty-five years ago, and now the descendants of these people are living on the point, having preserved their tongue, faith and traditions, and the waters of bay and harbour wash a singular remnant of Acadian life.

In the doorway of a house overlooking the harbour a young girl stood shading her eyes from the rays of the setting sun. It was Saturday afternoon, and the fishing smacks, with their sails all set to catch the most of the light breeze, were coming up the harbour, for the fishermen returned regularly for their Sunday Mass-going, and to get bait for the next week's cod-fishing.

The girl in the doorway watched their coming with a face which the sunlight could not brighten, so glad a look rested on the soft lips and wide brown eyes. It was a face of the real Acadian type; oval in contour, chin small, lips full and sweet, nose straight, with fine, quivering nostrils; complexion which the frequent fogs made like the inside of a shell, and under a low brow and clearly defined eye brows large eyes of hazel brown, drooping in the outer corners, the whole framed in glossy dark brown hair. This was Colombe Pellerin, whose father, drowned at sea, had descended from one of the three families who had populated Leboncoup, and whose names had supplanted all others in the settlement, so that there was none but Theriaults, Pellerins, and De Villiers in the place—the De Villiers far predominating.

In the simple life of this little village there is no inequality, and there was no suggestion of degradation in Colombe's going, at the death of her father, to help her mother and the numberless younger children, by serving as maid and companion to the widow De Villier, whose only daughter was dead, and with whom the young girl worked with no thought on either side of the difference implied elsewhere by the terms "maid" and "mistress."

As she stood watching the coming of the fishing boats, the widow De Villier—called Mrs. Amand to distinguish her from all the others of the same name—came up behind the girl, and, laying a hand on either casement of the door, peered over her shoulder to see how near the boats had come. Her thin face and dark eyes looked content, but though her son was on the boat that led the others, she had none of the rapture of expression which lit up Colombe's face. To her the weekly return had become a matter of custom, and though always a thing to rejoice over, had lost the wonder of the miracle of bliss it had been in her youth, when love was new, and hard work had not made her angular and thin.

She laid her hand on Colombe's shoulder, pointed outward without speaking, and nodded pleasantly. The girl turned in an irrepressible rapture, waved her hands, palms outwards, with a graceful motion towards the water, and, lifting Mrs. Amand's hand from her shoulder, kissed it twice passionately. It was only in this pantomime that one learned that she was deaf and dumb.

An hour later Colombe knelt before the kitchen fire, coaxing the reluctant sticks to kindle. The room was very clean, the floor covered with sail-cloth, painted by skilful hands in figures to represent oil-cloth. Dark wooden chairs were ranged against the wall upon which hung pictures of the sacred hearts of Jesus and Mary, that even when at work the women might not quite forget Heavenly matters.

A young man in a rough woollen shirt, weather-stained trousers, and battered hat, had entered; the girl's sealed senses could not welcome his presence, but an added sense supplied her lack. She felt his coming, and springing to her feet, darted forward, grasping his hands in a rapture which needed no speech for expression.

Toussaint de Villier was young, and the joy of the fair face so near his, born of happiness at his return, could not be displeasing.

He bent towards her his comely face, and putting his arm gently round her would have kissed her, but she drew back. The conventionality which taught other maidens to conceal their delight at such returns could never be conveyed to the deaf and dumb girl, but the instinct of maidenhood needed no teaching, and she shrank from his embrace while she fondled his hand.

Toussaint did not press her; fair as she was, he felt only a manly tenderness for his mother's good little silent helper, and his mind was very full of his own affairs. Withdrawing his hand with a kindly pat on the girl's dark hair, he went into the little bedroom off the kitchen, whence he presently issued, resplendent in best clothes, and the week's growth removed from his bronzed young face.

Tea was a short meal, and while Colombe and Mrs. Amand gathered up the dishes, Toussaint went out to join the group of men that had collected on the steps of the tiny shop opposite, where on Saturday and Sunday nights the entire male portion of the village assembled to discuss the week's fishing, and the prospects for the coming six days' haul.

By eight o'clock the group had dispersed; the admiring fringe of small boys which surrounded it had gone to bed, the older men had returned to their firesides, and the younger had gone to seek those who would one day preside over theirs.

The widow Amand glanced from time to time at Colombe's happy face. Toussaint, she well knew, had gone to see the pretty Odelle Theriault, whom his mother would gladly welcome in her dead daughter's place—but Colombe! Better than Toussaint, in his selfish happiness, Mrs. Amand knew that love had found its way into the secluded soul of the deaf and dumb girl. She knew, too, that she lacked the self-knowledge that could tell her what its coming meant, and without experience of books or men, had not yet felt jealousy; what would the rude awakening that lay before her bring to Colombe?

The elder women of Leboncoup are thin and lank, not unlike the prevailing firs—the effect in both cases of bleak climate, sharp winds, and sterile land; but in the worn bodies beat kindly hearts.

Mrs. Amand arose and laid her hand gently on the shoulder of the brooding girl, breaking into her happy reverie with the signal for bed.

Colombe obeyed with the ready docility she always showed, and except that the door was left ajar for Toussaint, the house was soon settled for the night.

The next day was, in the parlance of Leboncoup, "East-side Sunday." This means that on that day the priest, whose parish extends for sixty miles, would go to say Mass on the other side of the harbour, whither, as the tide served, a large portion of his west-side parishioners would follow him. At half-past nine the harbour was dotted with the white sails of the little crafts, prettily varied by the Venetian effects of those sloops, the sails of which are painted orange or red, all winding picturesquely through the dark islands, in their solemn fir and spruce growth, the blue of the water and the peculiarly clear air of this northern land giving the brilliancy that completed the picture.

Toussaint de Villier sat with his mother in the stern of a small boat, his face full of repressed, excited joy as he steered. In the bow, alone, sat Colombe; alone as no one else in the little community should ever be; wrapped in her unbroken silence like a consecration. Her eyes were dreamy, her lips smiling, and the fresh breeze ruffled her hair into little rings upon her flushing cheeks. No one could guess what the Mass-going meant to Colombe; no one could ever conjecture that anything in life meant to her to make her first communion like the other girls, doubly unlike them though she was through the difficulty in instructing her, and her innocence which knew no taint.

Toussaint, with his hand on the tiller and his eyes carefully ahead over the water, spoke, his dark cheek flushing. They used a patois French, at once a corruption and preservation of the French of two centuries ago.

"I spoke to Odelle last night, mother, and we settled it. We shall be married in September, after the fishing." His mother glanced hastily at Colombe; the sunshine rested on her happy face and Mrs. Amand lowered her voice, though no sound could pain her.

"Ah, poor Colombe," she whispered.

"Colombe!" exclaimed Toussaint. "What o Colombe? She never thought to marry me."

"She never thought at all. What does she know of your plans? But she can feel," answered his mother.

"Ah, well, she likes Odelle; she will be happy with us. She expects nothing better, a girl like that," said Toussaint easily.

"A girl like that is a girl like this," responded his mother. "But if she could hear, we would not discuss her; let us not now. My poor little tender one," she added, in spite of herself.

"Oh, Colombe! Colombe!" exclaimed Toussaint pettishly. "Odelle is the question. She will come home to supper to-night. Are you sorry to have me marry her? I thought you would be delighted, and now you talk of Colombe."

"I am very glad to have you marry her. She is the wife I should have chosen for you," said his mother, and they shook hands gravely. Colombe looked up, and seeing the movement, nodded gaily, and, rising, took a hand of each, and shook it merrily. Even Toussaint looked disconcerted for the moment, but seeing Odelle upon the wharf forgot Colombe in nodding to her. But Mrs. Amand's eyes were so dim that she needed Colombe's guiding hand as she climbed the steps.

The little fleet sailed back on the afternoon tide after vespers, and Odelle came to take tea in her future home. She was a pretty girl, and she looked very sweet in her happiness, which lent a grace to her every movement. Toussaint hovered about her, and Colombe sat forgotten by all but Mrs. Amand, who thought best to seem to forget her, too, as she saw in stolen glances the growing trouble in her face.

Odelle went away early to gain a longer time alone with Toussaint, who would start in the dawn for another week's fishing, and a lovers' eternity of separation.

When they were gone, Colombe came swiftly forth from the corner where she had watched Toussaint fold Odelle's cape about her with a tenderness that she had never seen in him, and which had made her cold and trembling with her first uncomprehended agony. Seizing the widow's hand in her shaking ones, she mutely asked the meaning of what she had seen. Words could have added nothing to the passion of her entreaty, and Mrs. Amand met her with the truth it deserved.

"Oui," she said aloud, forgetting her interlocutor's deafness. "Oui, ma pauvre petite, il l'aime; nous t'aimons itou (aussi)." Colombe understood, if not the words, the manner. Stretching out her hands in supplication to know all, she waited.

By gestures Mrs. Amand told her that Toussaint loved Odelle. Lifting the leaves of the calendar, she showed her the three months that intervened before the day when Odelle should come, and the capacity in which she would come she explained by leading poor Colombe into the adjoining bedroom—Toussaint's. Colombe stood quivering for a moment, trying to grasp this new thing, which was life and yet agony to her to whom hitherto life had meant joy and peace. Then she threw herself upon the floor beside the bed in a passion of weeping, more dreadful than it was inarticulate.

The great festival of the year was approaching—the church picnic, at which the country assembled for an area of thirty miles. During the three weeks preceding it Colombe crept about her duties, the shadow of herself. A grey mask seemed to have settled upon her sunny face, out of which her brown eyes looked with the helpless expression seen sometimes in dogs. She carefully avoided the window, Mrs. Amand knew, lest she should see Odelle passing.

The day of the picnic was bright and clear; the frequent fogs did not gather at its close. A great Ferris wheel was raised on the grounds, and targets for shooting, booths for food, booths for the sale of fancy articles; for the picnic was a curious mixture of bazaar and country fête. A covered platform for dancing was the most important feature, where, upon a stand at one end, the men who could play upon the fiddle or triangle took turns in furnishing the music for quadrilles and "country eights."

The fishing boats did not go out that Monday, the day purposely chosen that the men might have a chance to stay at home for the picnic, and all day the crowd round the stand waiting for a chance to dance was considerable. Colombe stood among them watching the quadrilles listlessly. Odelle had not yet arrived, and Toussaint was not dancing. No one but these two and Mrs. Amand guessed the girl's secret, and many commented with wonder upon her altered looks.

Suddenly Toussaint's face brightened, and he started forward. Colombe followed him with her eyes, saw Odelle, and set her teeth with a look not pleasant to see. The young lovers took their place in the set forming, and Colombe watched them with an expression her childish face had never worn, and which many noted with sudden enlightenment as to the change in her.

It all happened in a moment after that. Toussaint took his partner in his arms to turn. Odelle stepped back into place, and Colombe sprang on her like a panther, bore her to the ground, and began an assault that might have ended tragically, had not Toussaint, recovering from his surprise, thrown her off, and lifted Odelle from the floor. The music ceased in confusion, a dozen hands were laid on Colombe, who remained quite still, except for the sobs which shook her slight body.

Odelle interposed between her and the gathering crowd.

"Leave her to me," she said. "She was crazy for a moment, and could bear no more. She will be her own gentle self again. Poor Colombe! Toussaint, lift her, forgive her."

"Forgive her! Never," said the young man wrathfully. "The treacherous cat! I will not forgive her now or ever."

Odelle bent over the girl, and softly stroked her hair.

"For shame, when we are so happy," she said reproachfully. "She was mad, I tell you. She has no help in her dull misery. Who can wonder if it broke bounds."

As if to verify her words, Colombe raised her head, and turned to Odelle a face so heartbroken that the bystanders burst into involuntary exclamations of pity, and clasped Odelle's dress in mute imploring for pardon.

Odelle stooped and kissed her, but when Colombe turned to Toussaint he moved away, muttering between his teeth that he could not forget her face as she sprang on the girl he loved, and that, while he remembered it, forgiveness was out of the question.

The two months that intervened between the picnic and the marriage of Odelle Theriault and Toussaint de Villier were filled for Leboncoup by interest in the little tragedy enacted in the widow Amand's house. The village, among its virtues, shared the vice common to all places where larger interests are wanted, of a lively concern as to others' affairs, and it was only natural that tongues were busy over the unhappy fate of Colombe. In the one outbreak of her life the passion that had turned her sweetness into bitterness had been vented, and those who had condemned her at first ended by accepting the theory of a temporary insanity of grief, and pitied her.

No one would have known her for the bright creature who had watched the boats come home in the June sunshine a few weeks before. All colour had faded from her cheeks, her step was slow, her form drooping; she never smiled, but went about her tasks in patient apathy, which touched all hearts. All but one, for whose mercy she vainly pleaded with all the eloquence of her speechlessness. Toussaint, who she followed with heartbroken eyes, Toussaint alone withheld the forgiving smile she craved. And so the week before the wedding came, and Colombe was eager in her efforts to make the house ready for Toussaint's bride, for he was the youngest son, and, according to the Leboncoup custom, to him as such belonged the right of bringing his wife to the paternal roof.

She had followed Odelle with imploring meekness and every sign of sorrow from the day of the picnic, and the happier girl had done all in her power to lighten the lot of her to whom she had brought pain.

In response to Colombe's appeal to be allowed to help in her preparations, she had given her the wedding veil to hem, and had insisted that Colombe alone should be her bridesmaid.

It was to her entreaties, and to the necessity of forgiving all wrongs before the marriage sacraments, that Colombe owed at last Toussaint's pardon, accorded as a good-night benediction on the eve of the marriage. When the girl saw him coming towards her with a half smile for the first time in so many weeks, she went to meet him and knelt suddenly at his feet. Toussaint extended his hand. Instead, she bent her head beneath it, and laid her cheek tenderly for a moment on his foot. Then she raised her face, trembling but tearless, and with a smile of strange brightness, signified that not then, but to-morrow he would truly forgive poor Colombe. And they wondered later if her life, sinless, except for her one bitterly repented fault, had won for her the right to hear with her sealed ears the rush of coming events and her silent lips to prophesy.

The wedding day was fair, with piled up clouds in the west that betokened the coming of wind. The nuptial mass was early, but from far and wide everyone came to see the marriage about which so much interest had gathered. Pretty as the bride was in her simple gown of rose-coloured cashmere and soft tulle veil, all eyes were turned on the bridesmaid, whose face was as white as her snowy dress, and whose eyes shone with strange lustre under her dark hair, as she walked as one set apart to some great purpose, or so they said later when they recalled her face, and interpreted her look by the light of subsequent knowledge.

According to the customs of the village, one meal of the day was eaten under the groom's roof, another under the bride's. As Odelle lived on the east side, the wedding breakfast, more probably dinner, was given at Mrs. Amand's, whence the bridal pair would go to take supper and spend the night in Odelle's maiden home. Old

Nicholas Theriault, the fiddler, had come, and, dinner over, dancing began, where everyone claimed the honour of dancing with the bride. Pretty Odelle, flushed and gay, was glad to rest when the summons came for her to make ready for the sail across the harbour for the early supper, and to meet the friends who awaited her on the other side.

During the dancing Colombe had been absent. She had sat through dinner, not eating, but calm, with the same uplifted look upon her white face which it had worn in the church, and had immediately retired to the solitude of her room, whither many thoughts followed her with loving pity. Now in her capacity of bridesmaid she was to accompany Odelle across the harbour, she and Louis de Villier, Toussaint's cousin and best man. Odelle came down soon, with a dark cloak covering her rose-coloured gown, but Colombe lingered.

At last she came, stepping loiteringly down the stairs, still in her thin white dress, though the wind had risen.

As they saw her face, an involuntary exclamation broke from the guests who had gathered at the foot of the stairs to wish the bride God-speed, and an old woman crossed herself, as she drew tighter the black silk kerchief worn after the manner of Acadians in place of bonnet, saying:

"Mon Dieu, elle voit les anges."

Colombe's mother, softly crying, and Mrs. Amand pressed forward to the girl, lifting her thin dress protestingly, signifying that it was growing cold. But Colombe shook her head smilingly, spreading wide her arms.

Then she clasped her mother's face and Mrs. Amand's in turn in her hands, kissed them each, and turned again to kiss Mrs. Amand, pointing to Toussaint waiting outside.

"Dépêche-toi, dépêche-toi," he cried, turning at that moment and beckoning, and Colombe hastened to obey.

The bridal party went on board the little boat that awaited them at the wharf. Louis de Villier sat far forward in the bow, Colombe on the side, Toussaint and his wife in the stern. The wind blew in puffs, and the sky was darkening. Odelle shivered as Toussaint wrapped her cloak about her, but Colombe looked straight over the water with the gaze of one who felt neither cold nor heat.

It was in the channel, half way across, that the squall struck them. It was the work of a moment. The boat careened, then jibbed; the young bride, wrapped in her cloak, the heavy folds of which made her helpless, was swept into the water. She fainted and sank at once, when a white figure plunged after her, seized her as she rose, and held her up. It was Colombe, and she could not swim.

"Quick, Louis: take her," cried Toussaint madly, for the girls rose near the bow and he could not reach them.

But when Louis leant over to take Odelle, Colombe motioned him away, and pointing to Toussaint, sank with her burden.

Toussaint, with a dreadful oath, cursed her as a murderess; but in a moment they rose again. Colombe struggling to support the unconscious Odelle, and this time it was Toussaint who leaned out to seize her.

With a supreme effort Colombe raised Odelle and placed her in her husband's arms, and both men saw the bright smile with which she did so. Then she folded her arms upon her breast, and sank for ever.

In vain they hovered round the spot, and the boats from shore, bringing those who had seen the accident, came to their assistance. Colombe did not rise again, and in the last rays of the setting sun a sorrowful wedding party sailed silently to shore.

There could be no sleep that night, and everyone sat through the long hours, talking softly of the sweet dove's innocent life and tragic end.

Odelle sobbed on her husband's breast, seeking the comfort he could not give, as he remembered the pardon he had withheld from the dead girl, the price she had paid to win it, and read at last the meaning of her dying smile.

It was early in the dawn when they went once more to the shore of the little harbour, hoping that the incoming tide had brought them that which they had sought in vain.

And the kindly waters had done their work, for, white and still in the grey light, her dark hair clinging to her cheeks, her lips smiling with her last thought that now Toussaint would look gently on her, among the soft green grass lay Colombe Pellerin.

"An American Emperor."

A NEW STORY BY MR. LOUIS TRACY.

Those readers of Short Stories who read Mr. Louis Tracy's "Final War" when it ran as a serial through Pearson's Weekly will be delighted to hear that we have secured another story from his pen. This will commence in the Christmas Week Number of P. W., published on December 19th.

Mr. Tracy's second story is even more dramatic, more entertaining—more sensational, shall we say!—than his first. He has taken a daring plot, and daringly treated it. The story is called—

"AN AMERICAN EMPEROR."

THE STORY OF THE FOURTH EMPIRE OF FRANCE.

Jerome K. Vansittart is the richest man in the world, a young man, a man with an iron will, a man with high principles. He is at the opera, and falls violently in love with a lady in the opposite box.

How he gets an introduction to this lady would spoil the story to tell. Mademoiselle Honorine de Montpensier, however, is a lineal descendant of two lines of French kings, and will not marry Vansittart because she considers herself committed by Fate to re-establish the Monarchy or die unwed. A man will do anything to gain the woman he loves, as we know, so Jerome K. Vansittart decides to be a king.

It would be unfair to spoil the reader's pleasure by detailing more of this delightful narrative here.

If he would read one of the most entrancing stories ever written he must commence it in the Christmas Week Number of Pearson's Weekly. There we shall give a very large first instalment, so that the reader can get an interest in the story at once.

Remember,

"AN AMERICAN EMPEROR"

Will commence in the Christmas Week Number of Pearson's Weekly, published on December 19th.

CHAPTER XIX.

The Last Great Fight.

Scarcely two hours had gone since dawn when the rebels, by that time, doubtless, of their full strength, moved forward to the attack in jubilant array, thinking nothing but that we should fall easy victims to their overpowering numbers.

The ground we had chosen for our stand was a gently sloping plain, dipping down from a grassy knoll in our rear to a marshy tract right across our van, and thence rising again towards the hilly country beyond, which opened out straight in front of us in a wide, well-wooded ravine. On our left was the silent town, with its four-terraced, flat-topped pyramid—strange monument of Atlantian rule, towering above the empty houses. To the right a stream, narrow, but deep there, came from the hills, bubbling between its fern-fringed banks as it passed on its way to waste its eager flood in the saturated stretch of mossy, weedy marsh in the hollow below. It was an excellent position to await an enemy's attack, the more so as the enemy approached only from the front, and must force the passage of the marsh while at the mercy of our missiles. To take full advantage of the natural benefits of such a situation, I placed my men thuswise.

In our rear, on the slope of the little hillock, I stationed wary old Cuzcon, with five thousand picked veterans, all good swordsmen, as a reserve force. Their duty it was to guard the stores and camp followers until the tide of war wavered, and then to turn it in our favour by a headlong rush. In front, all along the edge of the swampy ground, I placed my two best regiments of archers and slingers, each five thousand strong, myself their captain; and between these and the reserve, Marenso with ten thousand spears and lances waited for the struggle when it should surge across the low level. On the left, Atris occupied the outskirts of the town with another ten thousand men, while Valdo, with an equal number, lined the banks of the rushing stream to the right.

The enemy advanced with little attempt at order, trusting more to overpowering odds than disposition of their forces, or previous instruction. In the middle of the army, as it poured down the gorge in their rear, came forty thousand renegade Atlantian soldiers and settlers; all the manhood that remained of our once great colony, now that many had landed to help the Prince of Aidè, and never returned, now that the savages, after years of subjection, had carried fire and sword through all the country, until the Governor had perforce made alliance with them to save alive the few who were left, and to raise the flag of revolt.

On the right wing, as they neared us, and spread out on the slope, came a yelling crowd of Huacans, marshalled under their own various banners and many-coloured ensigns, nearly twice as numerous as their white allies; and on the left wing a still larger force of Ulmecs, a sterner race than their kindred redskins, better disciplined, and more cunning in their tactics, a race of barbarians but lately from the wild region of the north. In the front rank, armour-clad, I saw with grim joy Vichri and Sothi stalking together with one whom some of my soldiers pointed out as Quitzaal, a fine, tall man with long grey beard, and another of lighter form and lither figure, more resplendently attired than the rest, whom no one in our army knew. Also, when their first line reached the sedges of the swamp I recognised the Prince of Aidè leading a party of swordsmen to the left flank, the white-crossed banner of blue that the rebels followed being borne before him. Of these they had several; in all our army there was one only, which I kept near myself, a torn and tattered rag, arrow-pierced, sword-cut, blood-stained, rain-soiled, but still streaming defiantly in the eastern breeze, the same brave flag of gold with the fiery sun upon it, that has floated over the conquering armies of Atlantis for more than a thousand years.

On came the vast array, surging like the sea in its resistless might, on, till the foremost files set foot in the treacherous marsh and sank at each step lower and lower, till they strode breast high through rushes and slimy water, struggling desperately to keep footing in face of the ceaseless shower of missiles that we discharged upon them with deadly effect.

Then those men in the rear brought hastily bound faggots from the forest, and piled them thick in the path to make a secure roadway across, but slow work they found it, with our arrows and bullets raining down upon them in a pitiless storm, pinning men to their own faggots, hurling them over into the black, thick ooze, and building up a causeway of writhing human flesh, more quickly than one of timber. Meantime, most of the Huacans, sweeping round, had fallen on our left, keeping Atris full-handed, while the crafty Ulmecs, creeping up through the bushes on our right, were engaging Valdo's flank with stubborn perseverance across the rivulet, slowly but surely pressing their way inwards and upwards. Seeing the danger of neglecting them, I bade the men in my command turn their volleying upon each flank into the swarms of barbarians, and let the rebels in front gain their way across the marsh if they could do so. That order obeyed, the causeway of faggots grew, though slowly and wearily, whilst the storm of missiles, diverted outwards, for a moment checked the savage advance. For a moment only, though, for, recovering from their first dismay, the teeming hosts pressed on again, throwing themselves headlong, heedless, reckless, upon our thin and faltering lines, dying by thousands as they came, yet those behind forcing on the front ranks with resistless impetus. Atris, indeed, continued to hold his own well; the nature of the ground was there more difficult for the attack, many of the outlying buildings of the town affording protection to the marksmen, also the Huacans had already tasted defeat at our hands, and were cautious of risking it again.

But the Ulmecs who were besetting Valdo so severely were a fiercer race, as yet unbeaten by our armies, and in greater number, so that it is no cause for wonder that after withstanding the terrible onslaught of the yelling horde with unparalleled devotion for three long hours, our right wing gave back a space, allowing the enemy to cross the stream, wavered under the renewed attack, and finally broke its ranks, falling in disordered array upon our centre, the triumphant barbarians pouring after in a countless host.

I hastened to Valdo's aid at once with my five thousand slingers, and rallying the shattered lines at last, made good another stand, presenting a yieldless front to the eager foes, who dashed themselves in maddened rage upon our solid ranks as the billows of an angry sea dash and break upon a rocky shore. At this juncture old Cuzcon sent down a thousand of his hardy veterans, taking the Ulmecs in flank and cutting through their crippled companies like a living spear as they tore along with splendid coolness till they reached our men. I had no fear of the right wing, then, and hastened down to the front, where Marenso stood calmly waiting the onset of the rebels, sending off a thousand archers to aid Atris as I went.

He uttered a fearful growl of pain.

By dint of hard toil, the main body, under Quitzaal, had won across the marsh and were engaged in a brisk skirmish with the Sleeper's weak but resolute force of 10,000 men, to whom I now added my 4,000 archers.

Forward came the rebels over the narrow, uneven, insecure footway, and as they came, hurled themselves upon us with all their strength. 'Twas a fierce, sharp struggle before all had passed the dangerous ground, galled as they were by our deadly rain of bronze-tipped shafts, and many rolled over into the reedy quagmire on either hand, or were trampled as they fell out of all shape of human kind as their comrades pressed sternly on, but, at length, some 30,000 soldiers, our own countrymen, armed and nerved as ourselves, were slowly forcing us, step by step, bit by bit, up the gentle slope, now rendered slippery by the fallen bodies. Long and stubbornly we fought them there, slaying two of them for every one of us who fell, now charging down and making them give back on the treacherous foothold, now retreating upwards before their gradual advance, and ever quitting ourselves as men who have no fear of death, but only of dishonour.

The sun rose higher in the heavens, reached the zenith, and declined from thence towards the western distance, but still, 'neath the broiling heat, 'mid all the din and roar of battle, we held our place on that hillside, retiring slowly, it is true, but fighting, fighting, fighting!—never for a moment relaxing our efforts, never ceasing to dispute every sheltering bush, or tree, or curving earth projection that gave us an advantage, never casting eye at those who fell around us, but stepping into their places with silent readiness.

The sun sloped nearer to the sky-line as the day waned, yet still we strove against those dreadful odds, not dismayed, not disheartened, by the exultant cries of the foe and the savage yells of the two barbarian hosts that still thundered impotently on either side; and despite the desperate endeavour of the enemy to compass our destruction by nightfall, held our precarious ground till darkness stayed the strife, and both armies took a breathing space in the quiet, friendly shadows, to eat and to rest, and, if it might be, to sleep before the morrow's sun should rouse to arms once more.

During the night I made several strategic alterations in the placing of my troops, bringing to the front two thousand men from the right, and as many from the left, and dividing our van, which had borne the brunt of the battle, into two brigades, one behind the other, myself leading the first and Marenso the second. That done, I spent the remainder of the night pacing our lines, looking at the hundred watch-fires of the enemy on each side of our post, blazing up and dying down in alternation, throwing long, deep shadows into the ghostly glades beyond, where the tall trees stood out gaunt in the glare of the flames. There was not the slightest chance of sleep for me that night, till the sounds of the busy camps had subsided to a faint murmur, and had risen again with the opening day to a muttering roar; till the stars shrank back into the depths of heaven, and the few night-clouds began to scurry across the sky in the growing light; till the watch-fires sank lower and lower in the brightening air, and their charred embers smoked and smouldered greyly in the new dawn. Then, as soon as we could make out friend and foe, we were locked in the death-grip again, striving might and main for life and victory upon that stretch of rising ground.

Thoth! what a stand was that, of our handful of soldiers beset by a myriad foes, all eager for our end! What deeds of heroism were wrought against those tireless copper-coloured armies, against the overpowering rebels who bore the blue banner up the slope in spite of all our struggles! What varying hopes and fears lightened and darkened our minds as the tide of battle rose and fell, now higher, now lower, but ever creeping up to the little knoll where Cuzcon waited, looking out over the scene with stern and unmoved visage!

For hours I searched along our line in quest of Vichri or Sothi, but my patience was unrewarded till noon had come again, when, in heading a desperate sally downhill, I met them both, fighting arm to arm.

"Now, demons in human shape and cowards withal!" I cried hoarsely, as I swept down upon their band; "at last I find you at my sword's point, where I have desired. Say your supplications to the Spirits now and quickly, that I may send you to haunt the shadows without delay, while you have no passport pieces in your hands!"

Sothi drew aside when I spoke, and his craven face blanched, but one-eared Vichri, bold in his badness, answered, scornfully disdainful:

"Great words from a little mind, Arnon the Pirate. Brave words from a hideous being. Loud words from a bullying cur. Rash words from a baffled General. Fate-sealing words from one already doomed."

"Villain! strong in acrid bitterness and evil lies and acts, and treacheries, and idle boasts; but frail of courage and unwise in head—taste that, and see if 'tis to your palate!" I said, striking out at him with "Sunderer" with all my force. The blade, though parried and foiled of its aim, came down like a dart of light, slicing off his solitary ear as neatly as it would have slit an orange in twain.

"Art one-eared no longer now, but earless!" I laughed loudly. "'Twill teach thee to heap vile abuse on thy betters in future!"

He uttered a fearful growl of pain as the severed member fell to the ground, and, made frantic by the agony and by my taunts, attacked me like a wild beast, raining blows upon me fast and furious, with sword in one hand and dagger in the other, cursing and shrieking the while, so that the sound of our conflict rose high above the roar of the battle that surged around us with unbated vigour. Parrying and fencing, I gave way before his blind, mad rage for a time, letting his strength exhaust itself, drawing him further and further from his own ranks, and then, when his blows came feebler and wilder, I turned on him with a fierce oath, and drove him back again, now plying him with remorseless rage, and spilling his blood with "Sunderer's" point in a dozen places before I made the finishing stroke.

Sothi, from the first clash of our weapons, had been seeking a chance to deal me a foul stroke in the struggle, but was prevented by the watchfulness of Alcis, the standard-bearer, who upheld the good old flag against all comers, guarding my back at the same time; and when I turned like a lion at bay and swept Vichri before me, Sothi turned tail and fled for safety a hundred paces away. A full half hour I played with my victim, piercing him here, slashing him there, dashing his dagger from his hand, shivering his blade into twenty fragments, and hacking his armour to unrecognisable shreds. In vain he strove with feet and teeth and nails when all his weapons were gone, and at last getting him down on his knees just as the Prince of Aidè and the unknown officer of the rebels rushed up with desperate charge, I struck off the hated head from the hated body, and, kicking it as it fell, hurled it far among the enemy.

"There goes the head of the vilest wretch in the camp!" I said to Alcis with exultation, "and an ugly one to boot, devoid of ears!"

"'Twere well off," said he, "and 'twere well if we could repel this onslaught or regain our men," for by this time the nearest of our soldiers was a hundred paces away, and the foe almost upon us.

"Lower the flag for a signal to Cuzcon!" I returned, "and we will stand our ground till he comes though all Ulmeca surround us. Take you this tall officer who comes here, the Prince of Aidè, and leave me the other."

"As you have said," replied the faithful soldier, obeying my order, signing to Cuzcon, and then with me facing the fearful charge that next moment burst upon us, overwhelming us as the incoming tide, urged by a strong head wind, submerges a defiant jutting point of rock arising from the sand.

Together we strove 'neath that tossing banner, now almost torn from our grasp or bent to the earth, and now floating aloft again in triumph, as one or other of us snatched it from the hands of the encircling foe. Once, with a great, hissing stroke, the Prince of Aidè shore its shaft in twain just above where my left hand held it, and a cry of victory rose from all around, but Alcis caught it as it fell and waved it aloft with a shout of joy, sweeping a clear space round him with his free hand the while. But our arms grew weary, for it was arduous work to guard our lives and that precious ensign too; and to us it seemed ages ere Cuzcon reached us, though we heard, as from afar, shouts of wonder and encouragement, and could just see, higher up the slope, Marenso striving to cut his way to assist us. At last, when I was growing faint from loss of blood—the sword-cut in my thigh that Thaska had given me in the great sea-fight having been re-opened by a thrice unlucky stroke—Alcis turned pale as death and tottering, would have let fall the flag but that I caught it from his nerveless fingers as he reeled against me. He was pierced through from the back with a long spear, the point coming out at his chest, and throwing up his arms in one last long sweep of his blade, sank expiring at my feet. But that last wild stroke of his sword cut its way through the heart of the Prince of Aidè.

Now Cuzcon and his veterans came thundering down the hill, Marenso's men parting to let them through, and all fresh to the battle drove our tired opponents before them down to the edge of the marsh as chaff before the wind, their keen, unsullied swords crashing as they went through helms and armour and shields, and leaving behind them a red track of death and dismay. As they passed I saw Sothi, borne on the human wave that went helpless before their front, and seeing him, fitted one of my smallest bullets to my sling, and whirling it singing round my head with all the strength I had, sent it hissing after the flying coward, and saw the tiny shining sphere bury itself in his brain. He reeled and fell, and that was the last of Sothi, who had not even courage to brazen out his evil deeds.

Then up the gradual declivity came Cuzcon again, scattering to right and left all the rebels who had formed in rank after the first charge; then down again to the swamp and out upon the causeway—now all solid with bodies trodden in among the faggots and the slime—repelling the barbarians who came to the relief of their discomfited allies, driving these latter, as they went over the slippery footway, into the red-coloured morass on either side, hewing away at the cloud of foes that soon encircled them, and slowly pushing them backwards and upwards. Higher up, however, Marenso's men, having had time to rally and re-form, made a determined stand, and the two forces, evenly balanced now, held each other in check till the light began to fail. All this time Atris and Valdo were keeping the two savage armies at bay; with difficulty, but with success.

Crawling away from the scene of carnage, I sought the border of the little stream over which the tide of battle had rolled, meaning to wash my wounds in its crystal waters, and cleanse my face from the grime and gore that disfigured it, but lo! when I bent to lave in the flowing rill, I saw that which made me recoil with loathing. It ran ruddy with blood, as a rivulet of crimson dye! while hacked and mutilated bodies and severed limbs, and fragments of flesh and shreds of stained clothing, came drifting down its reddened tide. Higher up, the fight was still raging upon its banks and in its flood, so that if I must have water I must seek it beyond the turmoil. Sick at heart, I turned away, and grasping "Sunderer" with wild resolve, strode along the winding, grass-grown side of the brook to where Valdo's regiments battled doggedly with the daubed and painted Ulmecs, led now by Quitzaal in person, who had left the main attack with intent to force our flank.

Right into the eddying strife I plunged, the pain of my wounds only serving to increase my recklessness, and right through it I struggled, making the good sword whirl around me as I went like a wheel of fire, bearing down axe and club and spear and blade and all things in its path, its keen edge drinking life-blood at every whizzing sweep and flashing curve, making the Red Barbarians, fierce-fanged creatures that they were, give back before my onset as a herd of frightened sheep before a hungry wolf, and at last winning for myself a clear way to the far verge of the battle, where the stream rippled over its pebbly bed untainted by the flow of human life. There, I threw myself upon its brink, drank a deep draught of the pure, refreshing fluid, washed off the sweat and dirt that stood on me in furrows and patches, bathed my hurts in the cleansing, restoring water, and, after binding them with grasses and pieces of clothing as best I could, sat awhile to rest and watch.

Looking to the left I saw Atris slowly sending the Huacans back, a dispirited crowd, towards the forest, while Valdo, in spite of the fearful odds against him, was also gaining ground, little by little, and forcing Quitzaal and his native troops more and more away from the grassy knoll lately occupied by Cuzcon. That worthy old veteran I could see with Marenso, striving like a lion to turn the current of war downhill, and so maintain the advantage already snatched by the first grand charge. The rebel Atlantians, so far as I could judge, seemed to excel our main body in number, and to be well able to prolong the contest till night once more put an end to the long drawn-out struggle.

Save for the unknown officer of slim, lithe form, this division of the hostile army was leaderless now that the Prince of Aidè and Vichri and Sothi were slain, and Quitzaal in another part of the field, but so far as the ability of one leader could compensate for the loss of four, the foe was well managed. The Unknown was everywhere, fought splendidly, led dashing sallies, or made gallant stands with equal ease, cheered on the flagging, laughed gaily with the brave, threatened the cowards and hangers-back, spoke words of comfort to those who fell near him, and ever kept so keen an eye upon the movements of our men that no stratagem availed to benefit us. Though the archers and slingers, as I could well see, made him their constant mark, though both Cuzcon and the Sleeper ever strove to reach him, the Unknown bore a charmed life and fought on as unconcernedly as though clad from top to toe in mail of proof. I followed his movements with admiring interest, thinking that presently, when I felt recovered, I would go down gladly to meet a foeman so worthy of my steel, one whom I could engage in honourable contest, to whom I owed no debt of vengeance unfulfilled; and noticed with pleasure how the rest depended on his leadership, showing how easily the day would be ours should he be laid low.

Hearing a loud cheer of triumph, I turned my head to discover Atris pursuing the beaten Huacans headlong from the field, with terrible slaughter. They had broken and fled, and the victors, after the first rush, checked their ardour and began skirting the edge of the morass with design to take our other enemies in the rear. "Well done, Atris!" I exclaimed, and "Well done, Valdo!" I added, when, looking west, I found that the Ulmecs were driven back across the stream at every point. I would have sat there some time longer, then; but, happening to glance once more at the main struggle, I saw that which made me spring to my feet in eagerness and tear down hill in hot haste, fitting a bullet to my sling as I went. Brave old Cuzcon had at last reached the Unknown Leader and crossed weapons with him, only to fall beneath a foul blow of the latter's long, thin blade. No thought now of honourable contest, for I liked that old veteran, who was always so hardy and hearty and jolly, with a liking akin to love, and was filled with anger at the dastard stroke that had laid him dead so suddenly, and as I ran, dispatched on its mission the leaden ball. It sang through the air, struck and shattered the long, thin blade, that moment uplifted to smite, but—accursed thing!—failed even to wound the Unknown Leader. I next tried an arrow, with still worse luck, for my hand was shaky and my aim hurried, so that the harmless shaft flew wide, and, growling thereat, I plunged into the thick of the battle with drawn sword.

The sun had now set, and the sky was gemmed with a thousand stars, unshaded by a single speck of floating mist, our arms were weary and our throats parched with thirst, yet we fought on there in the dim light with unabated zeal. Forcing my way to the front, I at last came face to face with the mysterious figure, and fire struck from our weapons as they clashed together, "Sunderer" sending the other's fresh blade spinning in the air a score of paces away. Then the Unknown, whose face was hidden by his mask, seemed all in a moment to lose heart, and shrank back to avoid my following stroke as no true soldier would have done, and the thirsting edge, baulked of its prey, rattled roughly, but harmlessly, upon the shining links of armour.

"Hast lost thy bravery all suddenly?" I said mockingly, holding my blade down. "When thou hast recovered it, will try another bout with thee, if thou art not too long."

For all answer, the Unknown snatched up another sword and fell upon me furiously, slashing and thrusting with feverish haste but little skill and less effect, so that a very few minutes sufficed me to send this new blade flying, and to wound the hand that held it, causing my opponent to sink to the ground with a moan of despair. I should have struck home then hard and true—and would that I had!—but that my gorge rose at the thought of slaying a foe so easily conquered and so helplessly at my mercy.

"Get to thy feet, and try another round with me!" I cried roughly. "'Tis naught but a scratch, and warriors are not wont to faint at sight of blood."

"Not warriors, indeed," answered the prostrate form, speaking now for the first time, and in a voice that awoke a hundred happy-evil memories, "not warriors, indeed, Macis, but high-born ladies may well be pardoned. Knowest me not, Macis, who art now known as Arnon the General? Hast so soon forgotten the Princess of Aidè, Listra, thy love?"

No, I had not forgotten, and I gritted my teeth in anger because I could not blot out the recollection of my fore-warned temptation and my miserable fall.

"I remember all," I answered sternly, bending down to raise my fallen temptress, who now tore off the mask to display her lovely features.

"Then, tell me, Macis," she asked, her soft eyes pleading harder than her voice, "oh, tell me, then, that what is rumoured of thyself and the Queen, that you are her secret lover, is an idle tale. Tell me that what I have done is wrongly done, and that you love me still," and she lay in my arms, not essaying to rise, though I would have helped her.

"What have you done, Princess?" I asked, thinking of Briseis, and feeling gladly that this wanton's spell was broken now for ever.

"Done," re-echoed she, "I have laid a trap for you and your army to walk into, I have set all my officers to slay you above all others, I have promised myself to whomsoever should cut short your career, nay, I have striven to kill you myself. All this I have done in my jealous passion, for, O Macis, I have loved you as I have loved no other, and I love you still with so deep a love that I could slay you and then myself sooner than see you the lord of a rival. O, Macis, by the ties that once bound us say that I have suffered needlessly, say that you love me as before. Vichri is dead, and the Prince, my husband, is dead also; there be none to come between us."

"Save the Queen," I answered coldly, not one word of her agonised pleading touching my heart to tenderness. "I cannot tell you what you wish, for 'twas only the thought—the baneful thought—of her falsity to me that led me to your arms. Elsewise I had not known you, and had left you to the warm attentions of your many lovers. Come, rise, I pray you, for the fight is closing round us."

She made no answer in words at first, but leapt to her feet with marvellous alacrity, and gave utterance to a piercing shriek—a shriek so long and shrill that it rose high above the din and clash of battle and the cries of vanquishing and vanquished men, a shriek so full of concentrated despair, embittered disappointment, and hopeless passion that its wailing echo rings in my ears even now. Then, with a gesture of intense anger, verging upon insensate hatred, she sank to the turf again, faintly murmuring as she fell:

"For this—for this—inconstant traitor—have I loved!"

"'Art overwrought," I said calmly, loosening the linked armour and allowing the cool night breeze to blow upon her. "Lie still, so, whilst I bind your wound," for I had noticed a thin red stream oozing from her side, and found a deep cut that needed bandaging. "When morning comes you will see matters differently."

Twice, with impatient motion, she tore off the rude binding, declaring, with a burst of bitter tears, that she would have no boon from one who spurned her; but at last tired nature gained the upper hand, and she suffered me to complete my task in silence.

"There, art safe now, till better help can be given thee," I said. "Now I will protect thee in this fierce whirl of war," and kneeling by her prostrate figure, with "Sunderer" drawn, I kept her from further hurt, for something—an evil spirit, it is likely—bade me act thus, returning good for evil.

A strange thing it seemed to me, the outcast and the whilom priest of Khem, to be bending there over the form of a princess whom I had once loved but now despised, who was clad in a soldier's garb, and wounded by my own hand; while all around us fierce faces pressed close and closer, swords clanged with ceaseless clamour, spears gleamed, daggers flashed in the dim light, arrows flew and fell in deadly rain, bullets whizzed about our ears like hail, men died by hundreds, and the woods rang with the deafening sounds of conflict.

Atris had now fallen on our foes on the rear and Valdo from the right, so that the remnant of the rebel force was now completely surrounded, and fast melting away before our triumphant encircling ring. They fought sturdily and long, did those doomed renegades; but without a leader, cut off from all hope, without ground to move into a good formation, the end was not long in coming, and with a sadly diminished and worn-out array, we were left the victors of that terrible struggle.

Thus, with a brilliant blaze of glory, the sun of Atlantis' military greatness set for ever.

JUMBLED STORY No. 23.] [See Page 726.

LOST AT SEA WITH HON. DANIEL VILLMIRK

"She is discovered writing at a table.

"Madame Durand, you must know, had founded greatest sensations that Paris had ever discovered. Handsome? Superb?"

"The Count and I considered ourselves rivals in society?" asked the Millionaire, who was thinking every member of the society, their plans, their poisoned dart or a bullet would be shot with the estimation with which Madame Durand held us dart through the Count's eye.

"Now, as you know, I am not a smoker, and by his hands in an expressive gesture—"Siberia for you to execute in connection with M. Slavonski! She saw it, she opened it, she read it, and then the member had been given a mission when—a traitor in her little finger than all the power of the king on everyone," he said.

"After finishing the letter she rang a bell and disfigured the lower part of his face, which the heavy terrific force down the smoker's throat, while the scent calls up a thousand recollections to my mind that I might die the death of a traitor.

"'This is what she is writing: 'My dear Count, Durand committed suicide on hearing of the death in my handwriting, signed with my name, and inventive genius, and thus useful.

"Within were the names and addresses of his throne—this little woman with her hand of iron, The sentence pleased him and the story bade fair fortune so they ought to be good. What? you don't receive the credit of having frustrated the traitor. Madame Durand, who was delighted with the idea. Slavonski touched his lips—"is this. The cigar contained in the centre a tiny cylinder filled with the instrument of death in his hand.

"This was the plan that the Count devised to smoke. Nonsense, man. Well, make an exception to be interesting.

"On the contrary, small, delicate-looking—in a Government"—Slavonski paused, and threw out word, petite. And yet this woman had more power to look at a man who is smoking a cigar. The very cigar itself would be consumed away, so as to leave the cigar in the flame.

"The society went to pieces, since Madame recovered to find myself the hero of one of the arm of his chair.

"Well, a grand coup was to be effected, each was discovered—a traitor—Slavonski!"

"The Count showed this ingenious cigar to me. His face was near mine as I put the end of the merest accident I placed the wrong end of the table.

"Well, the Count, you may be sure, having noted for the selectness of its patrons. After dinner insisted on taking me to dinner at a restaurant where I was then staying, and to offer me a cigar, gave it to a man-servant, with orders to deliver it to-day."

"Thanks, I'd rather not," replied Slavonski. "The woman."

"Ah," said the Millionaire. "Her heart of steel." She ordered him immediately to proceed to Paris, and leaning across the table, held the light towards himself in his chair, and smiled blandly with the members—among them myself and the Count that he had not wasted his dinner.

"All that I recollect of what then occurred"——fools that we were.

The Millionaire drank off his port and settled air of a man who has dined sumptuously.

The Millionaire pushed a box of cigars across the objects, everything in fact that he knew concerning moustache he wore did not entirely conceal.

His companion sitting opposite him was a inventive genius. His latest idea was a cigar which selected the Count as executioner, and when he directed to the Russian Government.

"But what of Madame Durand and the secret Russian, Slavonski by name. A horrible wound came to her in obedience to her letter, he held nothing behind which might tell a tale.

"The Count, as I have told you, was a man of powerful explosive. When the cigar was ignited a exploded in my mouth, but drove the poisoned from the table.

"Slavonski. I. In truth, however, it was not of her chosen lover," said Slavonski, rising abruptly immediately to the Count.

"Slavonski? You!" exclaimed the Millionaire.

The Millionaire threw his leg carelessly over the cigar in my mouth. The Count struck a match, precisely? I have an important comm ssion for which you told me—a pretty device!'

"Two days later I met the Count in Paris. He the Count offered me a cigar.

"Good. The curtain is rung up, and a woman and her heart of steel."

"Try one of these," he said, "they cost me a small fact is, it is as much as I can do to force myself even —ciel, and what recollections!"

Slavonski drew his hand across his eyes. He did bring about my downfall. He drew up a document not care to disclose his life's secret to this man. This secret society had precisely one hundred whom I have mentioned, who was a man of puzzled, I see. I will explain:

"What recollections?" he said. "Tell me; I I who was the traitor. It was the Count. You are known."

"Well," he said, "this is my story: First; a little white hand signed a death warrant. She drawn up this document, took good care that it will you come and see me at eleven o'clock to-night, and was at the head of a Russian secret society. And be sure and bring with you the cigar of them. Had this letter reached the Russian should fall into Madame's hands, and that he should But he was expected to amuse him.

"I was unconscious for a short time, but soon would like to know."

"He fell dead across the table.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY WITCH.

"THERE is something uncanny about the girl. I cannot make her out;" and Charlie Vanderveer puffed viciously at his cigar. "Why, the other night I was up there she started by reading my palm and ended by hypnotising me. By Jove! Tom, I was frightened—absolutely frightened."

"That is easy," answered Bransford with an indulgent smile.

"What, the palmistry or the hypnotism?"

"Both; and the frightening thrown in."

"Well, you will see her to-night, and can then judge for yourself. Here we are, now."

Saying which they walked up the broad steps of an uncomfortable-looking mansion, and were ushered into the drawing-room by a stately-looking butler.

Miss Morgan was as charming a girl as one would care to meet. She had beauty, numerous accomplishments, and, incidentally, wealth. Within the past few years she had developed a craze for anything bordering on the mystic or supernatural. At first it was palmistry, but recently it had developed into mind-reading, hypnotism, and ingeniously-planned, though entirely unsuccessful, wanderings of the astral body.

Yet she had impressed some of her friends to such an extent that they would dream night-marish dreams about her, and when they informed her of the fact she would calmly announce that she really had been with them in astral form.

Tom Bransford thought of all this as he was presented to this self-confessed witch. To her credit be it said that the young lady thought too much of her personal appearance to adopt any outlandish form of dress; on the contrary, the tout ensemble, while certainly bewitching, was anything but uncanny.

After the first introductions and perfunctory conventionalities, the conversation was turned to the subject of hypnotism, and Bransford volunteered to become a subject with foolhardy daring. "Just to see what the sensation was like," as he meekly explained.

Overjoyed at the prospect of a new victim to experiment upon, the young hostess offered him an invitingly comfortable-looking armchair, while she, seating herself before him and taking his hands in hers, directed that he should look steadily into her eyes. Bransford did so, while Miss Morgan fixed her lustrous eyes on his as though she would look him through and through.

"Don't stare at me that way too long, Miss Morgan; I have a weak heart," interrupted Bransford.

Estelle laughed.

"You must not interrupt the psychic current by talking. But tell me, have you experienced any strange sensations yet?"

"Yes," replied Bransford, "the strangest and wildest sensations. I can hardly talk. I feel that I am going—going." And, as a matter of fact, Tom's eyes closed while he was yet talking, and in another moment he collapsed, helpless and powerless, in the chair.

"I have never been so successful," cried the girl, clasping her hands delightedly. "He has passed beyond the suggestion stage, and now must be in the somnambulistic stage."

Then, turning to the limp form of Bransford, she commanded: "Stand up. You are now completely in my power. Stand up and open your eyes."

But Bransford did nothing of the sort. On the contrary, his legs and arms became rigid, his teeth clenched, and his breathing laboured.

Estelle turned pale.

"He is in the cataleptic stage; but I think I had better wake him up, don't you?"

"By all means," assented Vanderveer, whose face had assumed an almost greenish hue with fright.

But in vain did this fair disciple of Mesmer resort to passes, commands, and finally tearful entreaties. Bransford could not be aroused, and his condition seemed to become more serious every moment.

"Oh, Mr. Bransford, do wake up. If you have the slightest regard for me, I beseech of you to wake up," cried the girl anxiously. "Oh, Mr. Vanderveer, do you please say something to rouse him; your voice will be more familiar than mine."

"Tom," cried Charlie at the top of his voice, "wake up, old man!" Then shaking him by the shoulders, he pleaded with him wildly. "Tom, old friend, you are all right. Wake up, Tom, if you love me, wake up." Then reproachfully to Estelle: "He told you he had a weak heart."

"Yes," she replied, now crying hysterically, "but I thought he was joking. Do please go for a doctor as quickly as you can."

"But I can't leave him here; he'll fall on the floor," said Charlie. "Don't you think I had better carry him to the lounge?"

"Pray do, and then I can bathe his forehead with some extract, and fan him while you are gone."

Bransford's remains—for they hardly seemed to be more—were then laboriously half lifted, half dragged from the chair to the lounge, and a daintily embroidered pillow placed under his head. Estelle had in the meantime supplied herself with all available restoratives and took her place by his side, while Charlie hurried away for medical aid.

Left alone with her unfortunate victim, she unburdened her soul aloud.

"Oh, what have I done? Perhaps he will die. And I had heard so much about him. I was sure we were going to be good friends. And I did like him from the moment I saw him this evening—and now I have probably killed him. Oh, how could I do it—how could I do it?"

A sort of spasm passed over the unconscious form before her, and she thought his breathing had ceased, so she put her hand over his parted lips to see if she could feel any breath, when to her horror and surprise the trembling hand was kissed in a most life-like manner, and Bransford's dark eyes looked into hers with a humourous twinkle.

"Remember," he said quietly, "I am not responsible. I am hypnotised, you know." Then, still keeping her hand in his own, he sat up and asked gravely: "Don't you think that you have had a pretty good lesson in the danger of playing with edge-tools and dabbling in occult arts you do not know anything about?"

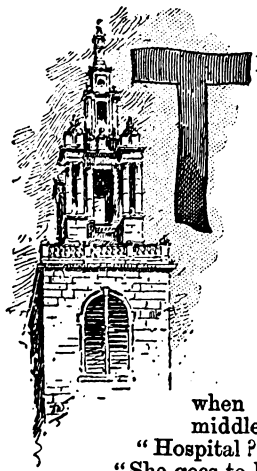
"I think it was perfectly abominable and cruel for you to give me such a terrible fright," she cried, pulling away her hand.

"It might easily have really occurred. Come now. You have said you like me, then forgive me; but promise to be a bewitching woman, and not a womanly witch in the future. The day of witchcraft has long since passed; nineteenth-century witches have no excuse for existing. Is it a bargain?"

"Rather a one-sided bargain; but I think you are right, and I promise."

When Vanderveer returned an hour later, after calling unsuccessfully on five physicians, he found Tom and Estelle chatting as cosily together as though they had been friends for years. BELLE BILLOWE.

THE SCUM THAT RISES.



THERE was the man, shadowing him as usual!

Mat was in the lodging-house, rallying not at all from the "accident" of three months ago. What kept the life in her? Gratitude? No it was not gratitude, for the mere fact of his dragging her from under the hoofs of the horses where she had let herself fall was scarcely calculated to call forth her gratitude.

He could recall that day, how she had looked at him when he pulled her out from the middle of the street.

"Hospital?" he had said to the policeman. "She goes to her home—my home. I'm her brother. Her name? Smith."

And there she had been nursed by him and old Mrs. Lanigan these three months, and—look!—there was that man taking the trouble of appearing not to shadow him.

He had been in close quarters before, and he might even now make a break for it and leave Mat.

Though, as for that, he might go and tell her the truth and the chances were that she would not despise him for possessing wit enough to baulk those who were tracking him. She had had her own failures in her short life, and she might even get up a new admiration for him because he declined a failure now.

Yet, if he told her the truth, he should have to tell her the manner of his life, and up to now he had kept that from her—he knew not why—and she would feel that he had been false to her in representing himself as a workman on half time, whose short hours of labour gave him the liberty to look after her, when Mrs. Lanigan was not sober enough to do so. He was now in the street where Mat's doctor lived.

He had gone out to see the doctor, after debating for hours with himself whether he should give in, or make a break for it. He pressed the electric button and entered the practitioner's consulting-room. He had called in for Mat. The doctor held out his hand in his bland manner.

"Ah!" he said, "you come concerning your sister. A most interesting case; the vitality is simply remarkable—remarkable, Mr. Smith."

"I want to know," said "Mr. Smith," "how long she's got to live."

The doctor looked at him; he thought this question as heartless as many a phase in people of this man's station in life—evidently the brother was tired of caring for his sister; it was not an unusual thing for such people to tire of their invalids.

"She may last a week," he answered, "though I do not think it will be so long."

Mr. Smith pulled a roll of notes from his pocket.

"This is all I've got," he said. "It's a good deal more than your bill can be. But Mat's to be looked after for a week, and you've got to be paid for keeping a secret. I am going to be arrested to-day. I am Bill Sharp—that's one of my names. I have been shadowed for months. I'm wanted by the police."

The doctor had stepped back. Sharp laughed:

"That's all right," he said. "But I think you'll do me a favour. Mat mustn't know what I am."

"She has told me how good you have been to her. Your sister——"

"She ain't my sister. I said she was to keep her from going to the hospital that time. See? Look here!" He frowned, noting the expression on the doctor's face. "I never saw her before that time she was hurt. She's had a hard scramble for her life, and she's only eighteen—no father, no mother, no anything, only hard, honest work to keep her soul and body together. She got tired at last and wanted to make an end of it that day I saved her. I—I want her to go on thinking I'm honest as she is."

"But if you are arrested to-day?"

"I'm coming to that. I'm going to have a job of work in Hackney and won't be back for ten days. Understand? In ten days—well, you know, it'll all be over with her by that time. All I want is for you to get a good nurse for her. And you won't give me away to her, will you? I don't think you're the sort of man to go back on a poor little thing like her, doctor—no father, or mother, all alone, and tired of her life. Doctor, I—I——"

"I'll help her," the doctor said. When Sharp stepped again into the street he saw evidences of his being apprehended before he had seen Mat for the last time. He would have proved dangerous to take at that moment—for hadn't he been sentimental in the doctor's office?

He lurched through a cross street.

Why should he break his record of eluding the grasp of the law? A note to Mat, a telegram would do as well as seeing her.

But he went on to the house, entered it, and went up the stairs.

He stepped to the hall window and looked out. Down in the street the man who had shadowed him for so long was reinforced by another, while two blue-coated "coppers" had paused in the doorway.

The looker-on smiled; he could do it, and it would be a joke to fool the men and in a place of safety plan for another bold stroke of business.

A low sound came to his ear, so low that he might have told himself that he had so often heard some such sound within the past three months that now it was always in his mind.

Should he go to that room?

"If Bill was only here!" A woman's voice in utter weariness sighed from the room.

He turned from the window and entered the room, closing and locking the door.

To see the cadaverous form upon the bed raised in expectation, to see the wan smile spread over the worn face till Mat was a thing transfigured—no longer a creature of pain and agony, no longer homeless and friendless, but a woman whose soul had waked to the need of woman—that one love in all the world upon which she can rely—was a cheering sight indeed to Bill.

"Why, Mat, old girl," he said, "have you missed me?"

"Oh, no," she answered. "I knew you'd come when you could."

He had a flower in his pocket, he gave it to her and she held it up to her heart.

"Now I'm going to fix up," he said, and went about the room tidying it as a man use to doing much for himself.

The girl was regarding the rose he had given her, passing one bony finger after the other over its velvet surface.

"It must be like the country, Bill," she said, "this rose, so fresh and pretty. Sometimes I get to thinking of the country, till I hear the air in the trees and the birds twittering as the sun comes up. My mother was born in the country and she used to tell me all about it when I was restless. When we were making coats for the sweaters she used to tell me about the cows on her father's place."

"I say, Mat," said the man, "Mrs. Lanigan's gone to a wake; she won't be any good for a week. By-the-way, how would you like to go to the country?"

"Would you go, too?" she asked, on the alert.

"Well, yes," he answered her, "after I get back."

"Back?" She let the rose fall on the sheet before her.

"I haven't told you," he went on confusedly, "that I've got to go to Hackney for ten days, have I? A job, you know. Ten days ain't long, and then, maybe, you can go to the country."

"That's all right," she replied drily. "And this job of work, will it pay you?"

"It's better than being on half time, isn't it?" he asked. "You might as well know it all. I've been to the doctor, and he'll have a nurse here to-day. And you won't miss me too much, you're too level-headed for that."

"Oh, no," she replied quickly. "Ten days, did you say?"

"Yes," he answered. "I'm going to-day."

He had told his lie and there was still time for him to get off and save his reputation as a successful man; that back window led to a court, the doctor would soon be here with the nurse, and there was an even chance that Mat would never know the truth, after all.

"Mat," he said hotly.

She raised her hand:

"Bill, let me say a word first."

"But I want to tell you——"

"Bill, what you've done for me has made me think of—up there." She pointed with the rose skyward. "Mother used to talk about it."

His face grew stubborn.

"I don't want to be soft," she said, "but wouldn't you do something before you go away? When you was a young 'un did you ever say 'Our Father'?"

"What rot!" he blurted out. She laughed. "That's all right," she said. "Perhaps it's lying here so long makes me soft, and——"

"Look here," he interrupted angrily, "it ain't much to say. I learnt it off of the matron at the Home when I was a kid."

"Oh, yes," she said gently, "you was brought up in a Home for children, wasn't you? I wish you'd had a mother—that is a mother to know. My mother would have liked you, and you'd have liked her. She was awful kind."

Every minute meant much to him; five minutes more and he might be too late to elude those men outside.

"It's your lead, Mat," he said. She hesitated a moment, and then she said, in a low voice, the "Our Father," in which he joined her clearly and distinctly.

When it was over, there was no movement on the part of either of them for the space of a second. Then slowly the man's face went down to hers, and for the first time since he had known her, his lips touched her cheek. With a low cry she flung her arms round his neck.

"Bill," she sobbed. "I hope you won't forget me—not all your life long."

"I won't, Mattie," he answered reassuringly. "I won't; so don't think anything like that."

"But why won't you?" she asked eagerly, still clinging to him. "Tell me why."

He did not answer her, but he held her off till she could look up into his eyes. Then he laid her head down upon his breast and folded his arms round her protectingly. He believed that she had seen in his eyes the answer he felt it would have been "soft" to word. A sound was borne in to him from the hall outside; someone tried the door.

He placed her head gently upon the pillow.

"Some friends o' mine," he said, "going with me."

He unlocked the door and rapidly gained her bedside again.

"Good-bye, Mat," he said hurriedly.

"Good-bye," she returned.

There were two men in the room, guarding the door.

"This is my sick sister," Sharp, or Smith, said quietly.

"No," cried the voice of Mat, "not his sister. I'm Mattie Morgan. He saved my life when I didn't care for anything in the world, and hadn't a friend. He did not know me till that minute, and he brought me here and nursed me, and he's the best man under God's Heaven. Now he's going away for ten days——"

"I've told her," interrupted the man, "that we're going to Hackney about that job of work, and I'll be back in ten days or so for a spell. I'm ready. Good-bye, Mat. The doctor will soon be here with the nurse."

"That's all right," she smiled cheerily. "Go, and have a good time after all this poking about the sick-room. Good-bye, old man—good-bye."

She kept her eyes on him till he was out of the room, though he did not again look at her.

"I'm glad he don't know how far away I'll be before ten days," she said softly to herself. "I'm glad he don't know how near the end is, poor Bill! In a few days—then I'll have the country out there in the cemetery."

She held the rose up to her lips, straining her ears to catch the last echo of the steps that went down the stairs. If she could only see him once more—if she might reach that window!

"Our Father, our Father, give me strength to get to the window so that I may see Bill once more!"

Out in the street, a man on each side of him, Sharp came. There was something in the men that angered him.

"You're thinking of the soft talk up in that room," he said. "She's dying, and she's such a young, little thing, and she hasn't anybody in the world, and—and——"

He struck his fist fiercely on the palm of the other hand, "I didn't know why I wanted her to think me an honest man. I know now. It was because she loved me; and if I'd been good enough for her I'd asked her to be my wife. Mat——"

Something seemed to force him to look up to the window of the room where she was. He started back; for she was resting on the sill, leaning far out, her eyes on him. He saw that she smiled and he smiled in return. Then with a weak movement she threw to him the rose he had given her. She saw him catch it and put it in his pocket, keeping his hand in the pocket with it. Then she saw nothing more, for she had fallen back from the window white and limp. So the nurse had really nothing to do when she came, and the doctor said the end had come suddenly, as it often did in these cases. But at that time Bill was in the car on the way to Hackney, his hand still clasping the rose, his thoughts reaching back to the girl he would have asked to be his wife if he had only been good enough for her.

CHAPTER LI.

SOMETHING STRANGE FOR BREAKFAST.

"OH, my dear, it's really 'evvenly, it is indeed! Breakfast out here in the ferander, and the garden right down to the cliff, and the yaller merrygolds and sunflowers, and sea like silver, and the sky as blue as blue. My! What a scene it would make, my dear.—It does one good to breathe."

"Then you are pleased, Aunt dear?"

"Pleased ain't the word for it, my precious! I am glad I've come. Now, look here. We won't talk no more about dying, neither of us, like we did yesterday, 'tain't worth it. Spite of all its bothers and troubles and worries, the world's too good for people to be in a hurry to go. Why, what with the nice, pretty, clean bedroom, and the window open, and being a bit tired, I slept for hours, and never felt that splinter in my arm once.—I did sleep!"

"I am glad, Aunt dear."

"And so did you, my pet."

"Did I, Aunt?"

"That you did, for I woke at two o'clock, and there was the moon shining on the sea from right away to the shore. And I came through to your room, and there you were with your pretty face on the pillow, sleeping just like an angel, and as innocent and good."

"Oh, you dear, foolish old Auntie! There, sit down; you must want your breakfast."

"Want it? I'm as hungry as a hogre, my dear. What is it—soles? Now, that is nice, so long as they're fresh. How clever someone was as invented eggs and crumbs."

They had just commenced their breakfast, in the corner of the verandah, when a party entered the empty coffee-room of the little hotel, talking rather noisily, and one of them said:

"There's a table close to that window; let's sit there;" and directly after it was evident from the voices that three men were taking their places to breakfast.

"You didn't lose much time," said one. "I thought I'd better send and ask you to come over."

"Quite right: can't be too careful over business. I had the pony put to, and came on at once."

"Coffee?"

"By-and-bye, I'll take a glass of something short first."

The table gong was sounded, an order was given for brandy and seltzer, and the conversation was renewed, to the accompaniment of the clattering of knives and forks, but Aunt Duncan was too much occupied over her breakfast to heed anything else till, raising her eyes, she saw Lucy sitting grasping the edge of the table, looking white and strange.

Before she could speak, the girl, who was seated with her back to the window a few feet away, held up her hand and whispered "Hush!" Then, half closing her eyes, she appeared to be listening intently.

All rights reserved by George Manville Fenn.]

"What——" began her Aunt, in an excited whisper, but an imperious gesture stopped her, and she, too, listened intently to words fraught with interest to another's fate.

CHAPTER LII.

A PLOT UNVEILED.

THE voice was familiar enough to Lucy. Once its rough tones had been heard they could not easily be forgotten, and, in addition, the speaker had a way of giving his lips a smack, as if to emphasise his words.

"Don't tell me," came clearly to the listeners' ears. "There isn't a doubt about it. She'll win, or my name ain't Vinnis; I haven't trained her for nothing. I know what I say. With my boy, Sam, up, nothing that's entered can come near her." And this was additionally emphasised by a thump on the table which made the cups rattle.

"Unless——" said the man who had first spoken.

"There ain't no unless in it," said the same harsh voice. "She's fit as a fiddle, sir; and it'll be a big thing for him, and so I tell you."

"Well, don't shout, old man."

"Oh, I'm not going to shout. You've sent for me, and I suppose you mean business."

"Of course."

"Stand in fair and square?"

"Stand in fair and square. And it means a pot of money for all of us."

"Ah, but it can't be done, sir."

"Oh, can't it? There, I'm not going to try and teach you your business, Josh Vinnis, I've known you too long."

"Yes. You've known me too long, sir."

"Well, I'm not the man for beating about the bush, and so I'll speak out. There's those behind me who will help us to make a big thing out of it. It means thousands apiece. We know, of course, that she's bound to win."

"Yes, sir, that's it. She's bound to win."

"Well, then, now's your time. You don't want to chuck away a fortune."

"That's so, sir. I don't."

"Will you join in it, then?"

"That depends. What does it mean? Put it straight out, and I'll tell you. I'm not going to spoil my character for a few pounds."

"Speak low."

"It's all right. The people at the other end have gone out of the room."

"Well, then, Mr. Vinnis, it means this—a couple of thou. if the mare can't win to-morrow."

"But she would win. A couple of thou. Bah! I shall clear that as it is, for I've made a good book, and so I tell you."

"Now we're getting to business," said another, who had hardly spoken before. "Very well, we'll guarantee you three. What do you say to that?"

Digitized by Google

"I'd like to have my glass filled again, gentlemen," said Vinnis. "A man wants a drop o' sperrits to keep the heart in him when he's being insulted."

"Business first, sir, and then we'll have in a bottle of fizz. Come, be reasonable. I tell you we share fair and square."

"And guarantee me ten thou.? That's my figure, gentlemen."

There was a hearty laugh, and the scratching of matches, followed by the pungent fumes of strong cigars.

"Make it twenty, old man," said the first speaker. "Don't do things by halves."

"I ain't goin' to, sir, and I ain't going to be unreasonable, but this is a big thing to me, and my figure's share and share alike, with a certainty of five thousand for me."

"There's my hand upon it," said the first speaker. "We'll give you five thou. if the mare comes in nowhere."

"That mare can't come in nowhere, gentlemen," said Vinnis in a low voice. "No pulling would make her. She's a regular little devil, and if my boy were to begin to play tricks with her mouth, she'd just get hold of the bit, and away she'd go like the wind."

"Then she mustn't run."

"That's it; not if she isn't to win the race."

"Very well, then, you must work her."

"Nay, I'm not going to hurt the mare: maybe she'll be mine some day. She's no use to anyone else."

"Why?"

"Because there's no one else dare mount her but my boy."

"You needn't hurt her."

"I'm not going to try, sir, for twenty thou., so there!" and the speaker banged his fist down upon the table again.

"All right: work it as you like, but if you can't pull, and you won't—er—get at her, I don't see how you're going to manage."

"Don't you? Well then, I do. You leave it to me."

"And suppose she wins?"

"Why, then you'll lose."

"Yes, and you too. But business, business."

"I've agreed: what more do you want, gentlemen?"

"To feel sure that we're not going to lose a pot o' money, Mr. Vinnis, that's all. Why can't you speak out?"

"Oh, I don't mind speaking out. I'm about tired of him and his ways. He's reg'lar broke up, and it would be all the better for me if he goes, because I shall get the mare. No one else dare buy her. Look here, gentlemen: you may as well make a big plunge of it, for as I am in it I'll do the thing right. It's make your hay while the sun shines, eh?"

"Yes, of course," said one of the trio hoarsely.

"Well, I'll tell you: it's simple as simple. The mare won't let anyone ride her but my boy. She'd savage anyone else who went near her—strike him down with her hoof, and then seize him by the throat with her teeth. No one dare mount her but my boy."

"The beast! Why, it would be a charity to poison her."

"What, a mare that can win any race I like to train her for? No, thank you. She can be made to bring in a big income for the man who owns her."

"Indeed!" said one of the men sarcastically. "What about Lord Braetoun?"

"That's a different matter, sir. It means a big income for the man who knows how to manage her, and that man isn't Lord Braetoun."

"Then you'd buy her if she came to the hammer?"

"I should, and perhaps I shall, eh?"

"Seems very likely; but what are you going to do?"

"Never you mind. You leave it to me."

"Well, we are going to, but you might say."

Vinnis gave a little laugh, and Lucy felt that she could see his low type, animal face, as he leant over the table and said in a low voice, but one that was perfectly audible to the listeners:

"Easy enough. You've got the right man to help you, I tell you, my boy is the only man she will let mount her."

"Yes; you told us that," said one of the men impatiently.

"Well, suppose Sam isn't there to-morrow."

"What!" cried the other. "By George! Josh Vinnis, you're a very Napoleon among trainers."

"Pst!" whispered his companion, and, rising softly, he walked to the window, struck a match, and stepped half out, to stand lighting a cigar, and then puffed away for a few minutes.

"What do you say to a sail?" he said aloud. "Sea's like glass. Lovely morning."

"Ah, wouldn't be a bad thing," said the other, as he turned back and walked in. "But you haven't done, have you?"

"Done? Yes. I don't know, though. I'll have another cup of coffee."

"Anyone there?" whispered his companion, rattling a coffee cup in the saucer the while.

"Yes."

"The devil!"

"Only an old woman and a girl at breakfast. They couldn't have heard out there. Visitors from town, I think."

They stopped talking for a few moments, and then passed out into the verandah, glancing sharply at Aunt Duncan and her niece, but the old lady looked stolid enough, and sat sipping her coffee, while Lucy bent over a loaf, from which she was cutting a slice.

The next minute the odour of strong cigars was all that was left to indicate that anyone had been there, and Lucy bent toward her aunt.

"Could you hear what they said?"

"Every word, my darling," said the old woman excitedly. "Why, it's a regular horse plot. They're going to ruin him."

"Auntie! it's dreadful. What shall I do?"

"Go and—— No, you mustn't go to him, my pet—write to him, and tell him what's going on."

"But what good will that do, Auntie?" cried Lucy wildly. "Mr. Daines says he has staked everything on the mare winning."

"Well, if he knows they'll be obliged to make her win."

"No, no, Auntie; it's a horrible piece of trickery. If he is told, it would only mean a quarrel, and he would discharge both the Vinnises. Oh, I never liked that man; and the boy, his son, is a nasty, foxy little wretch of a fellow. It's ruin for him—ruin. Don't talk to me, please. I want to think. What shall I do—what shall I do?"

"If it was me, Lucy, I should send for the police," said Aunt Duncan decisively.

"Oh, Auntie, Auntie; be silent, please," cried Lucy.

"But I'm that indignant I feel as if I must talk, my dear. Yes, I should send for the police."

"But can't you see that would do no good?"

"No, my darling. It's as bad as robbery. It's a reg'lar swindle, and the police would take 'em before the magistrates, and punish 'em."

"But that wouldn't make his mare win the race."

"Yes, it would, the magistrates would make the proper jockey ride her and win."

"No, no, no, Auntie," cried Lucy despairingly. "It's ruin for him—ruin. What shall I do?"

"Oh, dear me!" cried Aunt Duncan, "I never did see such a world as this is. Just as I settle myself down for a real bit of enjoyment, if all this don't go and happen. I did think we was going to have a pleasant outing, that I did."

"Please—please, Auntie, don't—don't talk," cried Lucy pleadingly. "I want to think what's best to do. Oh! Quick, Aunt, dear, those men are coming back, and that wretched Vinnis knows me from going down to the farm."

"What! Go away? No, my dear. Stop and face the wretch, say I, and let him see we know of his wickedness. You shall stop."

"No, no, come quickly. He must not see me here." And before the trio, consisting of the hard, horsey-looking trainer, and a couple of over-dressed, loud-looking beings of the bookmaker type, had reached one end of the verandah from the grounds, Lucy was hurrying through the coffee-room, and Aunt Duncan followed her to her room.

CHAPTER LIII.

The Virtuous Vinnises.

It was the day of the race, and Browwood was, as usual, thronged. Braetoun had passed the night at the hotel, and, looking haggard and feverish, he was crossing the hall when he ran against Daines.

"Hallo! You here?" he cried.

"Yes, I'm here."

"Don't look very cheerful. Haven't been betting against the mare, have you? Because, if so, hedge while there's time."

"Hang the mare!" cried Daines.

"After she has pulled this off for me, and as soon as you like, for I'm about sick of it all. Too much worry and anxiety over it, and I want rest."

"Are you on heavily?"

"Heavily? It's neck or nothing—man or mouse, my lad."

"Indeed!" said Daines, looking at him closely; "well, I had gathered that bit of news pretty nearly. I suppose you'll be a fool to the end."

"Yes, my boy! I shall be a fool to the end. Here, what are you staring at? Don't glare at a man like that. I look bad? Well, of course I do, with a thing like this on my mind; but I shall be all right afterwards, when she has pulled it off. She looks in the most perfect condition, Cy. You ought to make something off her. Josh Vinnis is a splendid trainer. Said he had always believed in the mare, and that nothing can touch her. Here, what are you glowering at? I do hate for a man to look at one like that."

"I was thinking how bad you looked."

"Well, so do you, for the matter of that."

"Enough to make me."

"Eh, what's wrong with you?"

"You ask that?"

"Of course I do. I want to know. Confound it, how slowly the time goes! Here, what are you thinking about?"

"I was thinking what a scoundrel you've turned out, Braetoun."

"What! No, I won't get in a passion. I've got too much at stake to-day, and must be cool. But what the devil do you mean?"

"You swore to me that everything was at an end between you and her."

"Well, what of that? I did swear it, and so it is. I'm sick of the girl, and of everything else. Take her, and marry her if you like. I never want to see her again. Now, why am I a scoundrel?"

"For playing fast and loose with everybody—wife—mistress—even with the man who has helped and served you again and again."

"Oh, well, that's all over now. When I asked you to get her away from me I never thought you were going to make a fool of yourself over the little jade."

"But it is not all over," cried Daines hotly. "Poor girl! She might be happy now if it were not for you and your confounded trifling with her feelings."

"Oh, hang her feelings! and you too. Don't worry me now with your conundrums. I've too much at stake. Speak out, man, speak out."

"I will," said Daines fiercely. "Where is she?"

"Whom do you mean—the mare or Lucy?"

"Don't play with me, man. Where is Lucy?"

"How the dickens should I know?"

"You do know, you trickster?"

"Look here, Cy, if you weren't a miserable cripple I'd knock you down."

"You're too helpless a wreck yourself now to do it. Even I, weak as I am, could thrash you."

"Who's the coward now?"

"You, for getting that poor lass away from me, knowing what you do."

"I—I get her away? Not likely."

"There, it's of no use to deny it. At your instigation she came down to Sandiwell the night before last, and stayed at the hotel."

"The dickens she did!"

"Bah! No acting, man. Yesterday she left the place again, about the same time that you came down from town."

"Daines, the detective, by Cyrus himself. Why, here's the wily copper on the trail."

"Do you want me to take you by the throat, Braetoun, and choke the truth out of you? I'm just in the humour to do the desperate, so take care."

There was something so fierce in his old companion's eyes that, broken as he was, and with shattered nerves, Braetoun shrank from him, and changed his tone entirely.

"Here, what is it, old man? I swear I didn't know she came down."

"You swear!" cried Daines bitterly. "Once your word was enough, but the gentleman is dead, and one has to deal with a horsey trickster, up to every move, and ready to play it even on his best friend."

"Well then, I won't swear. On my honour."

"Your honour!" cried Daines scornfully. "Where is she?"

"Gone to the devil for aught I know or care. Here, get out of the way; I must go to the stable again."

"You don't go till you've told me."

"If you try to stop me like this, hang you!—I'll hand you over to the police."

"If you live to do it," whispered Daines fiercely. "You're ready to go down now with one of your fits."

"Hang you!" cried Braetoun, trembling. "You coward! Knowing what you do, Daines, don't, don't upset me, man," he said, breaking down into a feeble tone of appeal. "I want all my strength now, to see this race through. I must win it. If I don't I must go under—bullet or something—and the old woman will be ruined too. I tell you I didn't know Baby came down. I haven't seen her. I haven't had her taken away."

Daines looked at his shifty eyes searchingly, and then said bitterly:

"I'd give the world to be able to believe you, Rod; but you've cheated me too often: I can't credit a word. Look here, I throw myself on your mercy. If you have a spark left in you of the old Rod Braetoun I loved as a boy and thought all that was manly and brave, and heroic, as I writhed at my own feebleness, help me. I've gone mad over her, Rod. I love her, and I'd give my life for hers, or to spare her pain. Now tell me where you have sent her, or—yes—I know it—she's here in this hotel."

Braetoun's face flushed with rage, but he turned pale again, and he said quite gently:

"I can't help what you feel about me. I suppose it's right, Cy. I took the wrong turn, and I'm what I am; but what I've said is the truth. I haven't seen or heard anything of the girl for more than three months. There, I must go to the stables now."

Daines made no attempt to stay him, but looked at him half convinced, and then went to the office of the hotel, for, as Braetoun went away, the idea came back to him that Lucy was in the house.

"No, sir," was the answer to his inquiries. "We've had every room taken for a fortnight. There was two fell in yesterday, but they were taken at once by a lady and gentleman."

"A young, slight, fair lady?"

The clerk laughed.

"Not at all, sir. Quite the opposite."

Daines turned away, and stood musing for a moment or two, and then followed Braetoun to the stables, where after some difficulty at the doors, Braetoun came out with a fierce look in his eyes.

"Now, look here," he cried, "there's only one thing in life for me for the next two or three hours, and if you're coming to worry me about that cursed woman I'll give you in charge for a madman."

"I'm not going to worry you. I'm not going to say a word to you, Braetoun, but I'm going to follow you like your shadow till I've found Lucy."

"Follow me, then, only let it be like my shadow, and then I shall not mind."

He walked back into the stable, where the mare was standing turning back her eyes to the opened door, and laying down her ears and arching her back, with her tail tucked lightly between her legs, beautiful, satin-skinned, the veins standing out like a net-work all over her neck, the very perfection of a highly bred racer of the most savage, vicious type.

Vinnis was there on guard, looking hard and important, ready to scowl at the new-comer as he chewed a cigar in his lips, one which had never been lit but was growing gradually shorter from the wrong end, while just beyond the end of the loose box in which the mare was tethered by a couple of reins, sat Sam Vinnis, the little, old, yellow-looking boy, withered, wrinkled, and cunning-looking as an antique Chinaman, and watching everything and everybody with his twinkling, ferrety eyes.

The boy was seated upon a corn-bin, covered from neck to toe in a long drab overcoat, his closely cropped bullet-head looking unpleasantly suggestive of a term of penal servitude; and as Braetoun addressed him he drummed with his heels upon the galvanised iron corn-bin, and grinned with insolent familiarity.

"Now, I trust to you, Sam," said Braetoun, "you must pull this off for me. Recollect I shall not be shabby to you but be ready to give you a very handsome tip."

"You let him alone, my lord," said Vinnis almost roughly. "He knows his bit, and he's 'gesting of it. I don't want him crammed with no noo idees. He's been told exactly what to do, and if you let him alone he'll do it."

"I only want him to understand that he must win, man," said Braetoun angrily.

"Well, that's what I've been a hinstructing of him over, my lord. Now, if you'll just go in the hotel, and make yourself comf'table till it's time to go to the race, and then just give a look in at the saddling paddock, everything'll go right."

"Yes, but I must see how things are going on," said Braetoun impatiently.

"Then what's the good o' me, my lord?" said the man roughly. "What have I been doin' all these months? There's my work, look at it, and your friend too. Fit as a fiddle arn't in it, aside that mare. Did you ever see anything fitter?"

"No: she's in splendid condition, Vinnis: but I cannot help feeling anxious."

"Why, o' course, my lord, and that's what me and the boy feels. We'll do our best; but if you comes a-hoppin' in and out here like a cat on hot bricks, and a-worrying me and Sam and the mare, you'll be chucking over a good thing, and you won't see Bella Donna when the figures are hoisted."

"Oh, very well: I'll go," said Braetoun.

"And the sooner the better, my lord, and your friend too. Me and Sam and the mare can't stand no fidgeting just now when we're ripe, so if you want the mare to win this race you must keep outer my stable."

"His insolence: it's insufferable," cried Braetoun, as soon as they were out in the road, the boy grinning, and the mare striking out with her off fore hoof, as they passed. "And here I am, Cy, regularly at their mercy. I felt as if I could have broken that young scoundrel's neck—the grinning ape!"

Daines said nothing, but walked beside his companion back to the hotel, beginning to feel that perhaps after all he was misjudging him, and at last leaving him to his own devices, he went on to the course, and had a look round in the faint hope that he might see Baby Lee somewhere about, she having perhaps come down to see Braetoun's horse win.

CHAPTER LIV.

In his Deepest Hole.

The day wore on, but Daines looked in vain. He examined every carriage drawn up in the best places along the course; went opposite the grand stand to scan it with his race glass, and finally took a ticket and went up to the very top, and from there searched the sides of the course in every direction, but there was no sign.

One race had been run, and the horses were out for the next, and coming slowly from the saddling paddock, but the bright animated looking scene was like a confused mass of people to Daines, who neither saw nor heard anything of what was going on, till he had descended and was about to return to the hotel in search of Braetoun, hoping that perhaps after all he would find out where Lucy was by watching her old lover's movements. For once more the feeling was gaining strength that Braetoun had brought her down, and she was waiting somewhere to see the race.

He was about half-way back to his hotel, when he passed a knot of business-looking men—horsey business-looking men—talking eagerly together, and as he was close up another joined them.

"It's right enough," he said excitedly. "Braetoun's mare won't come up to the post. She can't run."

The words did not impress Daines at first, his mind was too full of his own trouble, but at the end of a score of yards their importance to his old companion began to grow clearer.

Braetoun's mare not run? Why, it meant ruin to him, after the book he had made; and growing excited now, he hurried on toward the hotel, to see Braetoun and learn whether it was the truth.

But he did not have to go as far as the hotel, for about half-way there he encountered the object of his search in company with the trainer—Braetoun with his face ghastly, and Vinnis flushed as if with drink.

"Why, Braetoun, what does this mean?" said Daines eagerly.

"Ruin—and a bullet through my brain, I suppose," said the young man, with unnatural calmness.

"But, but I don't understand."

"Ask this old scoundrel," said Braetoun, with a mocking laugh.

"Now don't you get a-calling names, my lord, because that won't mend it," said the man. "I put it to you, sir," he continued, turning to Daines; "you come into the stable this morning where I didn't want you, and you see for yourself as the mare was in just puffick condition. Even his lordship'll own that."

"Oh, yes, I own that," said Braetoun, with a peculiar laugh.

"And he knows, too, how I'd been a-beggin' and praying of him to keep away."

"Yes, from his own stable," said Daines.

"'Ired, sir, 'ired, or it would ha' been my stable. But he would come, messing about."

"Confound you; speak out," cried Daines impatiently. "Why can't the mare run?"

Digitized by Google

"That's what I'm a-tellin' on you, sir, if you'll let me," said the man. "Don't you turn 'ot and 'orty too, like his lordship, here. It's 'art-breaking to me. My charickter's spyled as a trainer, beside the money I shall lose, for I'd put all I'd got on the mare—years o' honest savings, sir."

"Why can't the mare run? She looked in splendid condition an hour ago."

"She is in puffick condition, sir, but how could I help it? I've been watching her night and day my very own self."

"Then she has been got at—hocussed?"

"A mare as I trained, sir?" said the man scornfully. "Not she, sir. I've the key o' that there stable in my pocket—leastwise I had till his lordship snatched it from me, as no gentleman would ha' done, but that's neither here nor there, sir."

"Will you come to the point?" cried Daines, and Braetoun uttered a low curious laugh.

"Yes, sir, I am a-coming to the point. It's all his lordship's doing, and he's ruined me and my charickter for life. He would keep on coming to the stable over and over again this morning, and last night, for the matter o' that, and giving my boy, Sam, orders and orders till the young rip was half mad. You see what he was this morning, sir."

"Yes, insolent enough to make one want to horsewhip him," said Daines.

"That's it, sir—that's it, only it warn't insolence; it was pride. He's the best jockey going, sir. My own training: and he'd ha' taken that there 'orse—I mean, mare—to the winning post, showing the field her 'eels, but as soon as my lord and you had gone outer the stable his pride got the better on him, and he jumps off the corn-bin, and 'Father,' he says, 'that there's done it at last. I may be a light weight and a little un, but I'm a man now, and I can't stand it, and I won't.'"

"That's it, Cy," said Braetoun, with a bitter laugh. "It was the pride of the noble boy who knew his value—that he was the only one who could ride the mare, and he has struck."

"Struck?" cried Daines.

"No, sir, no, it ain't that," said Vinnis, "he's about 'art-broken. He couldn't do it. 'Father,' he says, 'I can't ride her now. It's all over. I feel as if I can never ride again.'"

"Here, we're wasting time," cried Daines. "Quick, Rod, old man: you must win this race. It's a matter of money. Pay, man, and win."

"No, sir," said the trainer, drawing himself up; "don't you go and insult us too. I'm above suspicion, and as to that boy of mine, he wouldn't do a mean action to save his life."

"No," said Braetoun, taking out a cigar, and lighting it calmly, "not to save his life."

"Where is he now?" cried Daines.

"That's what I don't know, sir," said Vinnis piteously. "Rooshed outer the stable after I'd begged and prayed of him to stop. I'd ha' gone down on my bended knees to him, I would, but he'd turned mad with pride. 'His lordship treats me as if I was muck, father,' he says, 'and I can't stand it;' and as I said afore, roosh, he does, out of the stable, ready as he was, with his lordship's colours on—amber satin shirt, and black an' amber cap, and he's gone."

"Gone where?" cried Daines.

"'Eaven, I b'lieve, sir," said the man, rubbing one eye with his knuckle. "It's my b'lief, sir, as they'll drag him out o' the river as soon as the race is over."

"Yes, Cy," said Braetoun mockingly; "the little beast thought he'd wash his equine sins away before he went upward. He was too good to live." Then with a shriek of rage he turned upon the trainer. "Curse you, you lying hound! You've sold me. Out of my sight, or before I finish myself, I'll blow out your cursed brains."

"Well!" cried the trainer, in virtuous indignation, "if that's being a lord——"

"D——n you! go!" roared Daines, and raising his cane he struck the man with all his might across the face.

"Help me back to the hotel, Cy, old man," whispered Braetoun, with a ghastly look in his face. "Quick!"

"Here, driver!" cried Daines to a man who was passing, and he hurried his friend into an open fly. "Queen's Hotel, quick!"

"Right, sir;" and they were driven off, leaving the trainer gesticulating to a crowd collecting now, and the next moment a yell of execration was raised.

"Want to get at me?" panted Braetoun. "Well, stop the fly, and let them."

"No," cried Daines, who was standing up in the fly, looking over the hood; "they're at him, hunting him like a pack of hounds, and he's running for his life. Now, hold up, man. I believe what you said about Lucy, and I want to help you, for old times' sake."

"Thankye, old chap.—Yes, it was true, lad. I haven't seen her. She isn't here."

"Can't anything be done?"

"Yes: I'll give you the key, and you can go to the stable and put a bullet in Bella Donna's forehead."

"Talk sense, man."

"That is sense. No one but that boy can ride her."

"Then he must be found. Look here: if he wins, what can you afford to give him?"

"A thou.," said Braetoun, with a flash of eagerness in his eyes—"I'll give him two."

"That's right. He's away from his father now. Here we are. No foolery. You'd want a great many dives in the river to wash away your sins, man. You can't afford to die yet. Go up to your room and wait. Is there plenty of time?"

"A full half-hour yet," said Braetoun excitedly.

"Good. You're not fit to stir."

"No: I shall break down."

"Then wait. If that boy is to be found I'll bring him to you yet. In with you." And then, as Braetoun staggered into the hotel, Daines gave an order to the driver, and the horse was lashed into a gallop.

DRIVE AWAY THE DREADFUL DREAMS.

"A DREAM cometh of a multitude of business," says an ancient Hebrew proverb. Yes, and of many things besides business. The wisest man on earth knows no more than you do about how the body and the mind live and work together. All we know is that the condition of the body gives character and direction to the action of the mind, whether we wake or sleep. And the reverse is also largely true. The method of it is a mystery, and it's no use trying to fathom it. The facts, and how far we can control them, are all we need to trouble ourselves about.

Here, for example, is a woman who says that at a certain time she was disturbed with frightful dreams. They so broke her sleep and tired her out that she rose from her bed in the morning more exhausted than after a hard day's labour. That is exactly as it would be, if, without waking you, somebody should lance one of your veins and draw away a big bowlful of blood.

The ailment which led to this result began, she says, in June, 1891. At first there was nothing she could give a name to. She found herself weary, languid, and fatigued, as after a long and arduous journey; yet she had not left her home nor done any unusual work. She lost her life and energy as she might have lost a shilling without an idea how it came to pass.

"I had a foul taste in my mouth," she says, "and no wish to eat. After taking the least morsel I at once began to suffer pain in the chest and between the shoulder-blades. My head got so bad that when I rose suddenly from the chair, or stooped for any purpose, everything seemed to go whirling around me, and I felt as if I must fall to the ground."

At this point she speaks of her terrible dreams, already alluded to, and then continues: "My hands and feet were cold and clammy, and I became pale and wan as death. All the blood seemed to be gone from me. In the night—beside the awful dreams—I was troubled with sweats which took away the remnant of my strength.

"With all this, and with lack of power to relish and digest food, I came to be so low-spirited and weak that I gave up going outside the house. And what gave me most anxiety was a fear that I was going into a decline, my father and sister having died of consumption. Every day I grew weaker until my husband and friends gave up all hopes of me. I had medical treatment, but it did not avail.

"While in this condition, about as much dead as alive, my husband read in a little book of the cures wrought, often in desperate cases, by Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. He urged me to try it, but I answered him indifferently, having no faith in it. However, he got me a bottle at Mr. C. E. Davies', chemist, King Street, Carmarthen, and after having used it for only a week, I realised an improvement. My appetite was better, and what I ate agreed with me and gave me strength. This, as you may suppose, made me hopeful; and I willingly consented to continue with this medicine—the only one that had done me any good. Briefly, then, after having taken two bottles more, I was completely cured, and have kept well ever since. I have related these facts to many persons, and you are at liberty to publish them, if you wish, for the guidance of others similarly afflicted. (Signed) (Mrs.) Anne Davies, Cilarddu, Conwil, near Carmarthen, December 6th, 1894."

That Mrs. Davies did not have organic disease of the lungs (consumption) is shown by her rapid and complete recovery. But she had a disease which simulates consumption, and is (in a large sense) even more dangerous—chronic inflammatory dyspepsia, learnedly called gastritis. This disease, with its sequences, sweeps away more lives than consumption, and is infinitely more productive of suffering. Yet Mother Seigel's Syrup will cure it. Let us keep that fact always before our minds.

No. 415.] [ONE PENNY.

EDITED BY

C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

For the Week ending December 12th, 1896.

The Doctor's Diary.

STRANDED! That one emphatic word best expresses my position this pleasant spring morning. The catastrophe that has swept away my savings, the carefully garnered sum that was to pay for my summer trip is commonplace enough.

Banks break every day, and the funds of trusting depositors disappear in the collapse. I was one of those confiding depositors. Before me lies my cherished letter of credit, just a sheet of worthless waste-paper—nothing more. And when my hotel bill has been paid, and I have settled for that particularly stylish black-lace bonnet that tempted me on the Rue St. Honoré the other evening into becoming its purchaser, I shall stand alone in Paris with just thirty-seven francs in my purse. Stay—let me be exact—thirty-six francs and fifteen sous, to speak correctly.

And what an idiot I was not to have bought a return ticket when I purchased my passage! But I was so miserably run down when I started, and I had a vision of a visit to Berlin to investigate the Koch lymph question; and, also, I indulged in a dream of a trip to Vienna, and a consequent excursion to Trieste and Venice; and, in fact, there were so many delicious possibilities before me, that I could not decide what line of steamships I ought to come home by, or what exact date to fix for my voyage. And here I am, as I said before—stranded!

Well, I'll think the matter over. I'll bathe my face and smooth my hair; and then I'll go round to the little restaurant where I have been wont to take my meals, and I'll spend a few of my remaining francs on a good dinner. And then I'll try to come to some decision.

I want to think out some plan by which I can remain abroad for some time longer. I should hate to go creeping home, wailing and crestfallen, like a dog that has had his tail pinched in a doorway. Besides, I need the change so sorely, and I am just beginning to feel the good effects of my trip. I'll manage to stay over here somehow. I'll sink the M.D., and look for a situation.

But a situation—as what? I know little or nothing about foreign travel, so I cannot turn into a courier maid. I never could make my own dresses, or arrange my own hair satisfactorily, so I should hardly pass muster as lady's maid. I speak barely enough French to make my wants known and to get along with, so it is impossible for me to try for a place as governess, even if I were well up in the other fashionable accomplishments of the day, which, unfortunately, I am not. I can neither paint nor sing, nor play upon the piano.

The position for which I am really suited is that of nurse, or of companion to an invalid lady. I'll even stifle my pride and sink the M.D., as I said before, and look about me in search of such a situation.

There are so many persons who come abroad in search of health, that I might possibly discover a place that would be just what I wanted. Then I would remain on this side of the Channel for some months longer, and might have a chance of finishing my researches into the nature and effects of vegetable poisons, as compared with those of mineral ones. At all events, I'll write out an advertisement for the British Blazer, and I'll take it round at once, before going to my dinner.

JUNE 25TH. I take up my note-book to record the swift and unexpected success of my little scheme. have been engaged by Dr. Laurence Hurst as companion to Mrs. Hurst, who is in very delicate health, and who needs amusement and occupation for her mind. Dr. Hurst has himself taken the whole charge of his wife's case, and I can see that he is very jealous of any interference with his measures, for he asked me very particularly if I could be relied upon to administer medicines, and to carry out his directions in all respects.

I replied meekly that I had always been accustomed to obey my employer's wishes, and that I should never think of running contrary to any orders that I might receive.

What a providential thing it was for me, that twinge of pride that led me to conceal my actual status as a regularly diplomaed physician. For, from what I can see of Dr. Hurst, I am certain that he would never have consented to endure the presence of a rival doctor beneath his roof, and at the bedside of his wife. Fortunately, I persuaded the kind friends, that were my references as to respectability and capacity, to keep silent on the subject of my profession. So to-morrow I shall enter on my functions as plain Miss Davis—no longer Jane Davis, M.D.

June 26th. She is a most winning creature, is Mrs. Hurst, fair and delicate, with great, soft, wistful brown eyes, like those of a pet doe. There does not seem to be very much the matter with her. Certainly she is not consumptive, and I can ascertain no symptoms of heart disease. Still, she is far from well, and I shall study her case with interest. Meanwhile, I am already deeply interested in her as an individual, and not as a case. The plaintive sweetness of her voice, the timid touch of her delicate fingers when she took my hand in hers, and the shy, pretty way in which she said: "Now, I hope you are going to take good care of me, and help dear Laurence to make me well," all captivated me forthwith.

I am not altogether so fascinated with Dr. Hurst. He is small, and dark, and florid, is a great society man and an accomplished dancer, I am told; but he has a nervous, uncertain way of looking about him, and of acting, as well.

He fusses over the newspapers, and torments everybody about his letters and papers; and as soon as they arrive, he goes off to his own room to read them. However, he is certainly most devoted to his wife, and watches over her with unremitting solicitude. They have two fine children: Hugh, a rosy, sturdy boy of four; and baby Madge, who is just eight months old, and a most winsome little creature, as even I must confess, though in my position as an old maid I ought, of course, to abominate babies. But Madge is one of those cooing, laughing, sociable, little things that make friends with every stranger on the spot—never cries, and is altogther delightful.

Mrs. Hurst is not strong enough to have her little ones much with her; but her half-hour's play in the morning with the baby is, for her, I can see, the chief event of the day. She has an excellent nurse for them in the shape of a sturdy, good-natured Alsatian woman, called Catherine, whose patience, even with boisterous Hugh, seems to be untiring.

July 3rd, Boulogne-sur-Mer. Here we are established at this old-fashioned place of seaside resort. The move was rather a sudden one. The weather became very warm in Paris, so Dr. Hurst made up his mind to bring the whole party down here, having great faith in the tonic quality of the air, and also approving of the smooth, sandy beach as a playground for the children. Mrs. Hurst would have preferred Houlgate or Etretat, on account of the presence at either of those places of quite a number of her acquaintances, but her husband was deaf to her gentle pleadings.

"My dear Jessie," he said at length, rather impatiently, "society and excitement are just the worst things possible for you in your present ailing condition. Here, at Boulogne, you have nothing to do but recline on your chaise longue at the window, and look at the sea and read novels, and make haste to get well."

"I suppose Laurence is right, Jane," she said with a sigh, after he had left the room. "I do wish he could hasten my recovery in some way. It is so tiresome to be suffering always, and to feel one's self growing weaker day by day. Jane, I am beginning to believe that I shall never get well—that I am going to die."

"Dear Mrs. Hurst, you must not take to imagining all sorts of dismal things. Your recovery is only a question of time. And with a skilled physician always at hand——"

"And one who loves me so, and watches over me so carefully; and with such a faithful nurse as yourself, I ought to shake off my sickness very speedily. I have an idea, Jane—but you must say nothing about it to Laurence, for I once said something of the kind to him, and he got really angry with me—I think if I took less medicine that I should feel better."

Perhaps the medicines she is taking do not suit her case. At all events, she is looking very ill—far worse, in fact, than she did a week ago. Still, I have privately investigated the prescriptions; and they seem to be simple enough, and precisely suited to the nature of her illness, being chiefly preparations of iron in different forms. And as I am pledged to follow out the doctor's orders in all respects, I cannot very well encourage Mrs. Hurst in her idea of dispensing with drugs, even for a time.

July 8th. Decidedly Mrs. Hurst is growing worse. I can see a marked change in her within the last two or three days; and I am beginning to believe that I shall be professionally considered an arrant idiot. In spite of my medical studies, and the brilliant way in which I passed my examination, and my real enthusiasm for my profession, I fear that I am lacking in one of the most essential of a doctor's qualifications—the power of diagnosis. I cannot make out what it is that ails this poor lady, at whose bedside I have been watching for so many days. And, to make things worse, Dr. Hurst has been summoned to Paris on important business, which will detain him for a week or ten days. I can see that Mrs. Hurst feels his departure very much, though she is too weak to be very demonstrative. However, he has caused all the medicines that she is to take during his absence to be made up in sufficient quantities to last till his return, and has left me written directions as to the administering of them—in what proportions, at what intervals of time, etc. But the invalid will sadly miss, I fear, his constant companionship and his tender care, for he always insists upon preparing and administering even her beef tea, or milk and limewater, with his own hands.

July 14th. I am pleased to be able to record a decided improvement in Mrs. Hurst's condition. She is brighter and stronger, and declares that she feels infinitely better, in spite of the fact that she sadly misses her husband's watchful tenderness. But she takes nourishment now with genuine relish, and even with something of an appetite, and she had a game of romps with little Hugh this morning, which would have quite tired her out a week ago. Also she is resuming, one by one, the occupations that she had wholly laid aside. For instance, she wrote quite a long letter this morning in answer to one just received from her intimate friend, the Countess Cecchi, an Italian lady, whose acquaintance the Hursts made when they were at Monte Carlo last winter, and who stood godmother to little Madge, her own name being Margherita. She sent Mrs. Hurst one of her latest photographs the other day. What an exceedingly handsome woman!

I must not forget to record a piece of stupid awkwardness on my own part, which I perpetrated on the very day of Dr. Hurst's departure. It may serve as a warning to me to be more careful in future, if I set it down here in writing. In getting out the bottle containing the tonic, on whose effects the doctor relies so much for Mrs. Hurst, I let it slip from my fingers, and it fell on the marble hearthstone and was smashed to pieces. Luckily the side of the phial on which was pasted the label inscribed with the directions and the number of the prescription was merely cracked, so I was able to have the medicine made up again. I shall pay for the fresh bottle out of my own pocket, as a fine for myself for having been a fool, and shall say nothing about the accident to anyone.

JULY 20TH. Dr. Hurst returns this evening. The improvement in his wife's condition continues. If she goes on getting better in the same proportion that she has done within the last few days, she will be well by the time we leave Boulogne.

JULY 24TH. Mrs. Hurst is again very ill, and the doctor is more nervous and anxious about her than ever. He scarcely ever leaves her bedside, except to open and read the letters and papers which arrive for him daily by post. These he takes to his own room, and he shuts himself up there to peruse them at his leisure. I am certain that in the last lot he received there was a letter from the Countess Cecchi. Her handwriting is very peculiar, being unusually bold and heavy for a woman, and I recognised it in the direction. He said nothing to Mrs. Hurst about it, however. The Countess sent yesterday a pair of gold-embroidered Turkish slippers for the baby; tiny babouches in velvet, with wads of paper stuffed in the toes, to keep them in shape. A pretty token of remembrance, though little Madge is not quite old enough to put them on.

JULY 25TH. I am beginning to suspect that some of the worst of Mrs. Hurst's symptoms are caused by arsenic. I asked her the other day if she had ever taken any as a cosmetic to improve her complexion. She smiled faintly, and said that at one time an eruption had made its appearance on her face, and she had taken a preparation of arsenic for some months to remove it.

"And you never take any now, my dear lady?"

"Oh, no! Dr. Hurst would not approve of it, so please do not mention to him the fact of my having used it."

JULY 27TH. Mrs. Hurst's symptoms are much aggravated. If a change does not take place within the next fortnight, she will not live three weeks.

A horrible suspicion has gradually been taking shape and consistency in my mind. Seen by the light of recent occurrences, it seems to me that Mrs. Hurst is dying slowly by poison. But who is giving it to her? It is not I. It surely cannot be——

A strange occurrence has just come to arouse my suspicions to keen activity. Mrs. Hurst had been trying to take some milk and lime water, prepared with a tablespoonful of brandy, and all measured out by her attentive husband. She had swallowed only a small portion of it, and the doctor was coaxing her to drink some more, when little Hugh came trotting into the room. He spied the half-emptied tumbler on the tray, and seized it with a cry of triumph. His father literally struck the glass out of the child's hand, turning ghastly pale as he did so. Mrs Hurst was startled by the crash, but the doctor laid the blame on the little boy's carelessness. Yet the breakage was not Hugh's fault, but his own.

I have secured the bottom portion of the tumbler, as of course I helped to pick up the broken glass. It still contains sufficient milk to serve for an analysis.

JULY 29TH. I have made the analysis. My worst suspicions are confirmed. The milk was heavily charged with arsenic. I shall begin at once to administer antidotes to the patient. Also I had duplicate bottles of her medicine made up, which I keep under lock and key, and which I substitute for those which Dr. Hurst investigates so carefully.

But how to find out the truth? How am I to establish that link which is always so difficult to demonstrate in cases of poisoning—that which connects the poisoner with the crime? I must be on the watch; else, as the dangerous symptoms in Mrs. Hurst's malady begin to become ameliorated once more, the criminal, grown desperate, may be impelled to strike a decisive blow.

But what can be his motive? Why should anyone wish to murder so gentle and inoffensive a being as Mrs. Hurst? And from whence does he procure his supplies of poison? His prescriptions are all harmless; of that I have already assured myself. Perhaps I am mistaken, after all. But no, the poor lady's symptoms are unmistakable—and then that incident of the glass of milk!

AUGUST 5TH. Let me write down a relation of the events that have just transpired, though I can hardly as yet command myself enough to do it coherently.

Two days ago, Mrs Hurst, who has been gradually improving (thanks, I am assured, to the antidotes I have been administering to her in secret), was lying in bed in a very tranquil, if feeble, state. At the foot of the bed, and consequently screened from view by the bed curtains which are looped back, falling at the head and foot of the couch, was placed a low table, above which hung a mirror.

Dr. Hurst, after luncheon, brought in his writing materials, and declared that he meant to answer a number of letters to go by the post of the afternoon. "But I will not desert you, Jessie, dear, or even go as far as the sitting-room. I will not disturb you, but will be here within call." Mrs. Hurst acquiesced in her submissive, affectionate way, and the doctor sat down to his correspondence.

Just then Catherine brought in the baby to show off her new pretty slippers, the Countess Cecchi's gift, which were worn that day for the first time. The little one was sleepy, and was inclined to be cross, so as it was the nurse's dinner hour, I told Catherine that I would take charge of the child, and would try to get her to sleep if she would leave her with me. The truth was that I wanted to keep my eye on Dr. Hurst, a proceeding that I could very well manage whilst walking up and down the room with the baby. For a very thick letter, directed to him in the peculiar handwriting of the Countess Cecchi, arrived for him that morning. He retreated as usual to his own room to read it, and came forth looking visibly discomposed, and he has been absent-minded and gloomy ever since.

Time went on. Mrs. Hurst dozed, the doctor wrote and the baby went fast asleep in my arms; but I still continued my noiseless pacing to and fro. At last the doctor finished his voluminous epistle, signed it in his usual elaborate fashion with a grand flourish, got out an envelope, folded the written sheets, and slipped them into it.

Just then, his valet, Watson, tapped softly at the door, to announce the arrival of an English tailor from London, with half-a-dozen suits that Dr. Hurst had ordered, and over the non-appearance of which he had been fussing for some days past. So, merely wetting the gummed edge of the envelope flap, the doctor closed it; but without writing the direction, he tossed the blank envelope on the writing-table, turned, and went off in a great hurry.

Now was my chance—now or never! I laid little Madge softly down on the sofa, and snatching up the sheet of blotting paper that Dr. Hurst had been using, I held it before the mirror. Here and there a word only was legible, but those words confirmed my worst suspicions. I took possession of the letter, and hastily folded and placed some sheets of paper in an envelope, precisely like that which Dr. Hurst had employed. Leaving this fac-simile on the desk, I hid the real letter in my pocket, rang the bell to summon Catherine, and giving over the sleeping child and the slumbering invalid to her care, I hastened up to my bedroom, bolted the door to insure myself against interruption, and with a throbbing heart and trembling fingers, I proceeded to open the letter. This is what I read:

My own Darling, my only Love.—I cannot tell you, dearest and most adored of women, how much your last letter has distressed me. I can understand your impatience, but wait, and bear with the suspense and the anxiety of the affair just a little longer. I promise you that the crisis shall not be long delayed. I cannot comprehend how it is that Mrs. Hurst has lived so long. I thought her death imminent when I went off to Paris a few weeks ago (as I wrote you, I left so as to be out of the way when the final catastrophe took place), but when I returned I found her decidedly better.

One thing I have discovered—she used to take small doses of arsenic some years ago for the improvement of her complexion, and so her system became accustomed to the action of that poison, and she was thus enabled to resist its effects for so long. Also I mistrust that companion of hers—Jane Davis. I fancy she suspects something, but it is no matter if she does; I have never ordered or purchased a grain of arsenic all through my wife's illness, thanks to your wise suggestion of sending me whatever we found necessary. That was a capital idea of yours to forward the arsenic in the baby's slippers. I really thought that supply would prove sufficient to finish the affair, but there have been delays—inexplicable delays.

So we must try something else—something that will act with certainty as well as speedily. I suggest prussic acid, and send you the formula required to procure it. Have this prescription made up five or six times; for a single dose, though strong, would not necessarily prove fatal. I can administer it in a glass of almond cream, which Mrs. Hurst is fortunately very fond of, so that the peculiar odour of bitter almonds will excite no suspicion. You see, impatient though I am to fly to your side, I understand how to take all necessary precautions. And when all is over, what an existence of love and joy and luxury lies before us!

My wife's will, leaving me her whole fortune (with the reversion to the children, unhappily), is neither to be attacked nor set aside. I took good legal advice on that question when I was in Paris the other day. It will trammel us greatly to have the enjoyment of the income from the estate merely, but I could not persuade Jessie to leave me her fortune absolutely, as I wished her to do. However, we shall be wealthy enough to realise all our dreams of splendour—Love's paradise walled around with gold!

I think you had best send the prussic acid in some other article of finery for Madge. One of those large-sized Roman sashes would do to envelop it in, or you might send the baby a second pair of slippers; Mrs. Hurst was so pleased with the first pair. I think we have taken our precautions to perfection. No one can connect either one of us with Mrs. Hurst's death, even should the fact of the poisoning be found out, which is simply impossible. Good-bye, my dear love. In a few weeks we shall be together, never to be separated any more,—Yours adoringly, Laurence Hurst.

When I had read the last word of this dreadful letter I crushed it between my shaking hands and thrust it into my breast. What was I to do? How was I to save the unhappy lady from the direful fate that threatened her? The law? The commissary of police? Yes—yes—that was it—I must hurry to the police office. But while I was in the act of tying my bonnet there came a tap on the door, and Catherine's voice cried gleefully:

"Come downstairs, Mdlle. Jeanne—come down! The brother of madame has just arrived, and she wants you to help her to dress herself. And you must get out the new morning gown that monsieur brought her from Paris—so come—quick!"

"Her brother? Heaven be praised!" I murmured to myself, as, throwing aside my bonnet, I hastened downstairs.

I found myself face to face with a strongly built, serious-looking gentleman, Gilbert Flemming by name, a lawyer of high repute, as his sister had often told me.

After the first agitated greetings between the long-parted brother and sister were at an end, I took Mr. Flemming aside, told him the whole story of Mrs. Hurst's illness, and ended by placing the intercepted letter in his hands. As may well be imagined, he was inexpressibly shocked.

"I came over on a sudden impulse, Miss Davis," he said, "and I did not write to announce my coming, wishing to give my poor sister a surprise. It is as well that I did so, for, had the exact date of my arrival been known, that scoundrel would probably have terminated his nefarious work before I could get here."

Dr. Hurst was arrested for the attempted murder of his wife before the sun had set. In his elegant, carefully arranged clothing was found stored away enough poison to have killed a regiment. There was a packet of arsenic in the breast-pocket of his dress-coat, and another of corrosive sublimate in the lining of his dressing-gown, and so on.

And he must have had some deadly drug secreted in a hiding-place in the suit he had on when he was taken, for, though he was carefully searched before he was locked up in his cell, he was found dead the next morning, with every token of a death by poison on his distorted features. He had destroyed all the letters written to him by his accomplice; so the Countess Cecchi, not less guilty than himself, and probably more so, got off scot-free.

Mrs. Hurst long lay at death's door, no less from the shock to her system from learning of the guilt of her idolised husband, and his subsequent suicide, than from the effect of the poisons that had been administered to her. She recovered at last, and Mr. Flemming took her and her little ones back with him to England. He has settled on me a comfortable little annuity, as a reward, he said, for saving his sister's life. So I mean to remain in France for at least a year longer, to complete my investigations into the properties of mineral poisons.

IF A WOMAN WILL.

THE Rector of St Michael's sat in his study in deep perplexity. The general expression of his face was troubled; but occasionally an extremely self-complacent look stole over it, which was promptly and vigorously pulled back.

He held a cream-tinted envelope from which a faint perfume of violets was wafted. The charming writer floated before his mental vision. Her pretty white hands, appealing brown eyes, and small, daintily rounded figure, were quite pleasantly distinct; and the letter said:

DEAR MR. FIELDING,—I have no excuse to offer for this letter. I throw myself entirely upon your mercy and your manliness. I have argued. This is a matter of life or death with me. I see only one chance. Why is it unwomanly to take it? I have heard women say that a feeling of tenderness always sprang up in their hearts for a man when they knew he loved them. As for myself (is it brutal and indelicate to mention it?) I never thought of poor, dear Jack until he told me what I was to him, and I am sure his life with me satisfied him.

So arguing, I make a desperate throw. I love you. I have said it so often to myself that it is easy to write it. Has any idea of it ever crept into your absorbed, austere brain? With me, you can give your life to the church without one sordid thought; while I will give my life to you. Try to think of me. Try to withdraw yourself from your saintly absorption long enough to think of a woman—a woman who loves you.

MAY STARLEIGH.

It was an amazing letter. Again the self-complacent look came smirking up, and was disgustedly suppressed. The letter surprised him much more than the fact, for simple and austere as he really was he could not help noticing the extreme devotions of pretty little Mrs. Starleigh, and he often wondered why it did not touch him more. Why he felt so dreadfully bored sometimes. Now here this was. What could he say?

Just a little feeling of disgust came into his thoughts. "What ailed the woman? Why couldn't she act like other women? Really that reference to her wealth was a trifle coarse. Jack Starleigh in his life had been a good fellow, and to drag him in to point a moral in that kind of a love letter to another man was, to say the least, doubtful taste. Well, he must answer it the best he could."

There are a great many elements in which a man and a minister do not essentially differ. Even a minister cannot always tell the bold truth.

The Rev. Mr. Fielding had prepared a great many sermons, over which his wrestling was easy work compared to this answer to Mrs. Starleigh's letter:

MY DEAR MRS. STARLEIGH,—You have given me a higher mark of your regard than a man often receives, and I appreciate it accordingly—appreciate while I deplore.

Many years ago I had a romance which came to a sudden, sharp and awful termination in the death of the girl I was about to marry a week before the day of the wedding. Since then I have carried a dead heart. All women are as shadows to me. Your grace, beauty and kindliness, while they have been immeasurably grateful, have touched no responsive chord. The lack has been mine, not yours. It hurts me deeply to say this. I wish it were different.—Sincerely your friend, ROBERT FIELDING.

He wiped the perspiration away as he completed it. The pleasant consciousness of his own attractions, which he had first experienced, had quite passed away and he felt baited and uncomfortable.

"It will be pleasant," he said savagely, "to meet at every turn a woman who has proposed to me and been rejected."

A woman can reject a man, and meet him afterwards to any extent with the greatest equanimity; in fact it adds quite a delightful little spice to life, and if by any wiles of dress or manner she can keep the wounds still gaping, she is not especially averse to doing it.

With a man, a chivalrous man, though, it is different. He has the idea so firmly ingrained in him that a woman should have whatever she wants that he feels like a great sheepish brute if he has to deny her, especially when she wants him.

The Rev. Mr. Fielding found the situation quite unbearable. He felt uncomfortable to a degree whenever he met her socially. The formal parishonal calls which he was obliged to make on account of the observers in the parish of St. Michael were purgatorial. Quite often when he was preaching his eyes accidentally met hers and he knew he blushed to the roots of his hair, and she——

There never was a dog labouring under anything which his conscience could not quite condone, that guilt did not stamp itself indelibly upon him; while the cat—did you ever see her look anything but innocent even with the cream on her whiskers?

There was but one alternative for him and that was to leave St. Michael's. He did it sorrowfully, this poor victim to his own graces of mind and body, for he loved St. Michael's.

Life ran monotonously in his new parish for many months; he sometimes almost missed blushing at Mrs. Starleigh, when one day a visitor from the old parish said:

"Oh, by-the-way, it is rumoured that little Mrs. Starleigh is to be married. It is a wonder to me that, considering her wealth and what a charming woman she is, it has not happened before."

Mr. Fielding paced his study that night until very late; finally he wrote nervously, desperately, the following terse letter:

MY DEAR MRS. STARLEIGH,—Is it true that you are to be married? ROBERT FIELDING.

The distinctively feminine answer came by return of post:

DEAR MR. FIELDING,—Why? MAY STARLEIGH.

At precisely eight o'clock the next evening Mr. Fielding rang Mrs. Starleigh's door-bell. He was no longer austere or saintly absorbed, but tremendously agitated. If he hadn't been a minister he would have said he was a fool.

She came to meet him as though she had seen him yesterday, which might or might not be encouraging. He blundered into the parlour in some sort of a foolish fashion, then came to his subject with deadly directness.

"I have no excuse to offer," he said; "do with me as you will, but are you to be married?"

"That depends," she replied.

"On what?"

"On you," was the blushing but explicit answer.

And the Reverend Mr. Fielding felt that possibly there might be happier men than himself, but undoubtedly there were not—which all goes to show that a man's "no" is no more to be depended upon than a woman's.

THE QUEEN'S MESSENGER.

"I DARE not tell even you, darling."

"I think it very cruel and unkind of you; you cannot love me, or you would trust me."

"My darling wife, don't be unreasonable; as a Queen's Messenger I am sworn to absolute secrecy."

"Yes, to the outside world, but what harm could there be in telling me? you know I wouldn't repeat it."

"I know you wouldn't, dearest. Come here and sit on my knee and tell me what makes you so anxious to know my destination this time. You never wanted to know before."

"I don't know what's the matter with me to-night. I feel uneasy, as if something dreadful were going to happen," placing a warm, soft arm around his neck. "Tell me, Alec, just tell me the nearest big town, and I shall know that you love me and trust me." The appeal was followed up by a tender kiss.

Mrs. Cranston threw her arms around her husband.

Mr. Alec Cranston rapidly came to the conclusion that the only way out of this affair with peace was by telling his wife a deliberate lie, and as his expected answer was urgent—he promptly replied:

"Well, Kate, if you must know, I'm going to Paris."

Having progressed so far with the lie, and seeing the marked success it achieved, he couldn't resist adding to it.

"What will you give me if I will tell you more?"

"You dear boy, I knew you would tell me, and I only wanted to know to see if you loved me sufficiently to trust me with so great a secret."

"Then you don't want to hear any more?"

"Only when to expect you home again, my husband."

With the perversity innate in humanity, Cranston was disappointed.

"It's rather a risky business this time."

"In what way, dear?"

"Well, I'll tell you. I am taking documents over to Paris about the extradition of that dynamitard Tynan."

"Then you shan't go, Alec."

Cranston regretted his anxiety to continue that lie.

"I've no alternative, dearest, I must go."

"Oh, Alec, I knew something dreadful was going to happen. It is that you will be murdered; those horrid wretches will throw bombs at you, and I shall never see you again."

Mrs. Cranston threw her arms around her husband and wept as if her heart would break, and made Cranston feel a perfect brute—in fact he couldn't bear it.

"Forgive me, Kate, I was only yarning. Dearest, believe me, I am only going to Berlin on a diplomatic errand of the commonest kind."

"No, I knew you only say that to try and relieve my mind," looking up as if some brilliant idea had occurred. "What station do you go from?"

"Station? Oh, Charing Cross, of course."

"Then I will come and see you safely off."

"That would never do, sweetheart. First of all I have to call at the Foreign Office—and, by-the-way, I must be off—and in the second and most important place, if anyone from that office saw you there, it would mean my dismissal with ignominy and dishonour."

"But if I didn't speak to you, or appear to know you, and only just watched you safely away?"

"No harm in that, dear, of course, but would it be worth all the trouble?"

"I should come home contented."

"Very well, love, that is a compact. Now give me a long, loving kiss that will last me three days."

"Oh, will you be back so soon? Well, that is comforting."

Instead of allowing the cabby to drive to the Foreign Office as directed in the presence and hearing of his wife, Cranston told him to make for Temple Lane as fast as he could. Dismissing the cab in Fleet Street, Cranston ran down Middle Temple Lane, made several snipe-like dodges round corners, and quickly arrived at the particular building he required, up the stair-case of which he raced with most unbarrister-like haste.

"Hullo, Cranston," cried the startled occupier of the top flight, on seeing that gentleman enter unannounced, "I made sure it was an urgent brief for to-morrow, and I was wondering whether my numerous engagements would permit me to take it, and what the fees would be."

"You're a rapid thinker, Walter, but listen. Are you busy?"

"Not particularly."

"Then you can do me a good turn. I've received marching orders again, and for some unearthly reason or other my wife got the fidgets and persisted in wanting to know where I was going. To get out of it I told her a cram, but like a fool said I was going to Paris about the dynamitards."

"And you've scared her?"

"Rather. I tried to explain that it was only in fun I had said it, but no—the long and short of it is, she says she is going to Charing Cross to see me safely off, but as I didn't tell her by what train I was going, it is doubtful if she turns up. She has promised faithfully, however, not to speak or even appear to recognise me. Now will you take this long ulster of mine and go and pretend you are me, and lend me yours; you can have it back on Friday morning? Go on to the platform as if you were going by the train."

"But there seems a power of mystery over nothing, Alec. If your wife isn't going to molest you, why not go yourself; can't you trust her, or are you frightened of the waterworks?"

"I am not going from Charing Cross at all."

"If you had said that at first now, I needn't have exercised my legal acumen to discover imaginary why's and wherefores. It shall be done, Alec Cranston. Take care of that coat and don't dog-ear the pocket-flaps."

"I am about to dissemble," mused Mr. Walter Driffield, as he prepared for the fray. "Must be uncommon awkward sometimes for married Queen's Messengers. If I were the Government I would make the beggars swear to celibacy, for a clever woman could turn a man inside out in half-an-hour. I suppose they are given sealed despatches on that account. I must give Cranston full credit though, it is a neat get-out of the difficulty, if she don't spot me, by-the-way. By Jove, suppose she breaks down, and throws her arms round me and—Holy Moses, I never thought of that. Anyway, here goes," and the briefless Walter Driffield, barrister-at-law, started on his errand of doing a friend a good turn.

As Driffield was about the same height and build as his friend, there was not much likelihood of anyone detecting him when he put the coat-collar up—it hid quite half his face—and, determined to carry out the scheme to the merest detail, Driffield promptly did what he considered would be Cranston's first action—entered the refreshment-room. Before his drink had been touched, however, a well-dressed, nicely spoken man came up to Driffield and putting a hand on his shoulder said:

"You've given me a fine chase, Mr. Cranston, but quick, I think there is time. I have an imperative message for you to go to the Foreign Office. I've been to your house, but they told me you had driven there, and I've been on a sort of wild goose chase."

Anxious to shield his friend, Driffield, despite his legal acumen, couldn't decide whether to say he was not Cranston or to let matters take their chance. Thinking it might only be a letter or something, Driffield finally decided to risk going as Cranston.

"You've given me a fine chase, Mr. Cranston."

"If we are sharp, sir, you will be able to get the train; I've a good cab waiting."

Once in the cab and driving at a daring pace considering the traffic, Driffield regained his senses somewhat, and although he was afraid his friend might get hauled over the coals, couldn't help chuckling to think of the sell there would be for somebody on arriving at Her Majesty's Foreign Office if he had to see any of the big-wigs.

"Do you object to the window being down, Mr. Cranston?" asked his urbane companion. "I have a very weak chest and this east wind plays havoc with me."

Driffield had no objection, and the clumsy window was accordingly let down, soon to be covered with the steam breathed upon them.

Just as the hansom reached the cross end of Whitehall Gardens, where the light is disgracefully dim, the messenger from the Foreign Office blew his nose violently, and mopped his face and eyes, as if in the throes of influenza. This gave occupation to his left hand only, the other being busily engaged in extracting something from a case in his overcoat pocket. Upon this being accomplished, the hand was swiftly withdrawn and a handkerchief saturated with liquid ammonia was dashed into Driffield's face, blinding and stupefying him instantly.

When Driffield recovered consciousness and was able to piece together the incidents prior to his being nearly suffocated, he found himself in a windowless room about twelve feet square, lighted by a lamp, suspended through a hole in the ceiling, similar to those in railway carriages, only that this one was paraffin. His next discovery, after crawling off the bed he had been laid on, was that the room was partially padded, but whether to prevent self-injury or as a deadener of sound Driffield was of course ignorant. The bed was the sole piece of furniture in the room, and was a unique specimen of a craftily devised preventive of self-inflicted injuries. In the ordinary acceptation of the term there was neither head nor foot to it, and the parts usually hard were carefully covered with some soft material.

Such suggestive surroundings would scare most men, and Driffield was no exception. It was the uncertainty, the suspense, and feeling of dread that unnerved him, nor did he feel any easier in his mind when he noticed a sliding panel open near the ceiling, disclosing the lower features of a masked face. Only a few minutes elapsed, and three semi-masked individuals noiselessly entered the room.

Driffield's whole body quivered with rage, like a freshly trapped panther, and possessing extraordinary strength, could have swept the three intruders aside like straws, but to his agony saw they were each armed with a revolver.

"Sit down, Mr. Cranston, we intend no violence, at least, unless you decline to listen to reason. We have not taken the liberty of searching you, preferring to allow a gentleman of your position to avoid that disgrace, but we must insist upon your giving up at once all the papers and documents you were to have taken to Paris."

"You have made a great mistake; I am not Mr. Cranston at all."

"Come, sir, you surely know the world better than to think that desperate men like us can be bluffed that way!"

A handkerchief saturated with liquid ammonia was dashed into Driffield's face.

"Who are you?"

"Well! we call ourselves patriots!"

"Nihilists or Fenians?"

"Ah, it makes no matter which; we are all brothers, striving for one common end."

Up to this, one only of the three had spoken, as if elected as the spokesman, but another now interfered, and speaking with a strong foreign accent, and in a somewhat sneering tone said:

"Ve vaste much good time, mes amis."

"Yes, that is true," acquiesced the first speaker. "Mr. Cranston, I must ask you without any further procrastinating to give up your despatches."

"And I tell you, you are a pack of fools and have got the wrong man. I've no despatches! If you think I have—have a search for them."

The tone was anything but conciliatory, and the hitherto silent member of the trio immediately crossed the room and picked up the ulster, looked inside the collar, shrugged his shoulders and exclaimed:

"If you are not Mr. Cranston, why do you wear his coat?"

"It is his coat, I'll admit."

"And," producing a handkerchief from one of the pockets and reading "A. Cranston" on it, "you use his handkerchiefs for the same purpose, no doubt?

"We've tried persuasion and it has failed, now you shall have five minutes' grace, and unless you give up those documents within that time you will be searched."

"Might is right here I suppose," remarked Driffield, who was beginning to understand the situation.

And searched he was, the muzzle of a revolver being pointed at him during the operation. Each letter and odd bit of paper was examined and scrutinised with the utmost care, but on finishing without discovering those all-important despatches, the tempers of the three "brothers" slackened considerably.

"You have evidently got them concealed somewhere about you, Mr. Cranston. Again I ask you will you give them up, or is your clothing to be ripped to rags?"

"I have already told you, I don't know how many times, that I am not Mr. Cranston and have no documents or papers—except those you've seen, and look at those envelopes, you'll find them addressed to Walter Driffield, The Temple, and I am the Walter Driffield."

"We've had enough of this fooling, Mr. Cranston. I must now ask you to undress."

"That I absolutely refuse to do."

"Refusal means a repetition of your sensations in the cab last night, remember."

There was no alternative, but as a last protest Driffield said:

"If you will leave the room, and bring me something to put on, I will."

"You shall have my dressing-gown, sir, but you must disrobe here in our presence—you might swallow some palatable piece of information when our backs were turned. We will take care of your money and jewellery."

Driffield imagined it would take a long time to "rip his clothes to rags," but evidently there were professional pickers on the premises, for two of the original trio soon returned.

"As we have found nothing secreted about your clothing, Mr. Cranston, the reason is obvious, your instructions were evidently verbal. As soon as we leave the room, it will become absolutely dark, and will remain so until you call out that you are prepared to divulge your secret."

The room was perfectly dark, and not a sound penetrated from the outside world.

Despite Cranston's statement as to the improbability of his wife turning up at the station, she did, and saw her husband, as she thought, instead of taking train en route to Paris, quickly leave the station with some other man, and drive off in a hansom cab. Had her purse been more heavily weighted she would have followed that cab, for her suspicions were aroused, but as it was she had to be contented with noticing that the enamel plate at the rear of the cab was broken in such a manner as to leave the number a matter of conjecture. Debating as to her going straight home and upon the deceitfulness of men generally, she stood at one of the entrances of the station just as the real Mr. Cranston made his appearance. Taken so utterly by surprise she gave a little scream, but, suddenly remembering her promise, tried to look innocent. Cranston laughed.

"Trust you, indeed!" he said, still laughing.

"But, Alec, where have you come from, and am I to know you?" in a tone of bewilderment.

Three semi-masked individuals.

"Yes, little woman, it is quite safe fortunately. I thought I might be in time in case you did come to see me off. You see my marching orders have been postponed for a week."

"But, Alec dearest," still puzzled, "where's your coat and whose have you got on?"

"Oh, of course, that accounts for it; I had forgotten I met Driffield, and he was up to one of his larks and we exchanged."

"Then it must have been him I saw drive off just now?"

"In all probability it was. Now what do you say to doing a theatre now we are here, and a nice bit of supper somewhere after?"

"You dear boy; but look at me."

"Well—oh, hang the clothes. If not the best dressed you will be the handsomest woman there, so you needn't mind."

"Oh, you gave me such a turn, sir!"

It was considerably after midnight when Mr. and Mrs. Cranston returned home, and their reception was anything but cordial, the maid-servant giving a positive yell when she saw her master. Of course, such odd behaviour necessitated inquiries, and Martha, somewhat flustered, said:

"Oh, you gave me such a turn, sir, I thought you had gone to Paris."

"Indeed, who told you I was going there?"

"Nobody, sir, that is I thought——"

"Quite so, you were listening at the door. Well, you can go in the morning, as early as you like."

The whirring tinkle of an electric bell awoke the Cranston's during the night. After satisfying himself that it was the street bell, Alec slipped on a few things and went downstairs.

"Your front door was open, Mr. Cranston." The voice proceeded from a police officer.

"Was it?" he replied, slightly mystified. "I closed and fastened it myself last night. Just wait here a moment."

To use a slang expression—Queen's Messengers are awkward nuts to crack, either physically or otherwise, and practice makes them quick at taking in situations. Cranston dashed up to the servant's room and satisfied himself that Martha had gone, then as rapidly ran down to his own room, switched on a light, and to the terror of his wife began dressing as if life and death were at stake. They were, and he knew it. He quickly explained to his wife the arrangement of his with Driffield, and his fears, and she, although terribly frightened, remembered about the broken plate on the cab. In less than five minutes Cranston returned to the policeman, told him to keep an eye on the house, and vanished down the street, much to the man's amazement.

Luck befriended him in the form of a good cab and a better horse, which was soon flying along the empty streets at a pace that made the few belated pedestrians that were about stop and stare after it. Arrived at Charing Cross Station, Cranston stood near the few dilapidated conveyances that were there, and called out in a voice loud enough to be heard in Fleet Street:

"Which of you drivers wants to earn a sovereign?"

The effect was magical; there appeared to be five drivers for every cab.

"Do any of you know the driver of a hansom that has the tail-plate broken: it was here about 7 o'clock last night?"

No, there wasn't one of them knew. One old stager informed Cranston that they were night workers only.

"Wait a bit," suggested one. "I shouldn't wonder but what old Larry'd know 'un."

"Where is he?" asked Cranston eagerly.

"At the corfee stall by Morley's."

Cranston immediately ran off, telling his Jehu to follow.

"A' coorse I knows 'un. Where does 'e live? Back o' Guilford Street."

A sovereign placed in old Larry's palm quickened his memory in a marvellous manner, and he and Alec were soon off to the back of Guilford Street.

There was some doubt at first, old Larry being very uncertain as to the exact house. After a few minutes' careful examination of the bricks of one house, however, he drew Alec's attention to having found the right one, emphasising the statement with an oath. Finding nothing handier, Cranston commenced a terrific onslaught on the door with the butt end of a revolver, the first glimpse of which sent cold chills up Mr. Larry's back-bone. He made sure he had brought trouble for his pal. Suddenly an upper window was opened.

"Hello! hello! hello! we don't want no bloomin' earthquikes 'ere. Wot's this 'ere abart?"

"Come down quick, Bill, this 'ere gent wants ter see yer."

"So I should bloomin' well think," sagely remarked Bill, as his head vanished.

"You drove two gentlemen from Charing Cross station last night."

"Well, an' wot if I did?"

"I'll give you five pounds if you can take me to the house."

"Wot's this 'ere game?"

"Never mind now, time is flying; I can tell you on the way. Put a coat on—be smart."

On the way to New Scotland Yard, Bill was told all that was good for him to know, and he explained how the gent in the black coat had ordered him in King William Street to go to the station and wait. He further explained that his first instructions were to drive to the Foreign Office, but were changed to Bleat Street, Lambeth, where he took them.

Quite a procession of hansoms crossed Westminster Bridge just as Big Ben solemnly struck five—a procession of three. When the foremost arrived at George Street it stopped, as did the other two. The late occupants then walked down Bleat Street about twenty yards to an entry on the right, where half-a-dozen policemen were lying perdu. They had received their instructions at the Lambeth station by telephone. The inspector in command divided his forces, some going to cut off the retreat at the back, while the remainder walked straight to No. 9, front entrance.

The noise woke up the neighbours, but made no impression on those within No. 9, and finally the door had to be forced open.

The birds had flown; signs were not wanting to show the haste the late tenant had been in to vacate his domicile, but not a trace was left that could give the police the merest shadow of a clue.

Cranston and the inspector directed their search for Driffield, and were some time in finding him, but their efforts were finally rewarded.

"You were right, sir; that slavey of yours must have been in the swim, and given them the tip," remarked the inspector, while the men were still searching; "but, although they've got away now, I think we can pretty well tell whose work it is."

What a talk Driffield and the Cranstons had that day. Driffield was certain they would have tortured him to death, and of course Mrs. Cranston reminded Alec dear that she knew something dreadful was going to happen.

THE picture was full of mellow sunlight, with now and again a shadow, just to accentuate the brightness. Bobcaygeon had disappeared in the distance, and for a time there was no sound save the throb of the engine and the swish-swash of the wheel as the boat sped along through the clear waters of Sturgeon lake.

Two old women, who sat close together and talked in whispers to each other, were, beside myself, the only passengers aboard. Here and there we slipped past cool summer retreats, in their settings of green trees, with grassy lawns, rolling far back out of sight. There was a medley of bird notes in the air, and the fresh aromatic scent of the pines floated in upon the breeze.

"Yo' fust trip to Ontario?" asked the captain, seating himself on a camp-stool near by.

"Yes; I am spending a week or so at Bobcaygeon, for the fishing."

"Fine sport about here. Think I seen you an' the Scotchman out together day befo' yistiddy, if I don't mistake. Stoppin' at the Forest House, ain't you?"

"Well, I have a room at the Forest House, and drop in occasionally for meals; but I confine myself generally to fish diet. McDougal is a capital cook as well as fisherman, and he serves up the trout fresh from the water. I tell you what, they are fine."

"Ah, sir," he vouchsafed, "Canady is a great country—a big country, an' the fish an' the timber is prime; they can't be beat. But here we are at last. The Injun village is just about half a mile back. Keep to the path an' you can't miss it. You won't see much when you fin' it, howsomever—nothin' thar but dorgs an' half-breeds."

In another instant I found myself alone in the woods with no human habitation in sight. Everyone at Bobcaygeon had urged a visit to the Indian village, and I supposed I should find it along the regular line of traffic.

While I sat on a log, deliberating with myself as to my next move, a canoe touched the shore, and for one brief moment a young girl stood in it, lithe and supple, outlined against the quivering reeds. Her slim brown ankles peeped from under her crimson skirt, a blue shawl fluttered around her, and a yellow kerchief was knotted about her black hair. She looked like some bright, tropical bird poised for flight.

As she caught sight of me, a flood of colour surged into her face; then, with a light, joyous laugh, she tossed back her pretty, shapely head, and nodded impressively, while her eyes sparkled with pleasurable excitement.

"She is as beautiful as a picture, and I should like to frame her just as she stands," was my mental comment, but I lifted my hat and spoke to her in a matter-of-fact tone.

"I want to go to the Indian village, but have lost my way," I said. "Will you please direct me to it?"

"And why do you care to go there?" she asked, as she secured the canoe to the bank. "There is nothing to see. It is detestable."

She had come up very near me while she spoke, and now dropped down upon the log beside me as though it were quite the thing to do.

"Mamma and I, we have lived there since my father died," she went on, "for after he fell and hurt himself he could do no more work, and mamma was ill, so they were very, very poor. You know my father was half-Indian, and his father was a chief—a great chief. Once I saw him dressed up to see the Prince of Wales when he came over here. The old man had on his war paint, with feathers in his hair, and his blanket round him. I was little, and afraid of him, and I cried loud."

"Is your mother an Indian too?"

"Oh no! she is thoroughly French."

She raised her daintily pencilled brows and brought the tips of her fingers together with a tragic little gesture. She spoke English without an accent, but ever and anon, apparently unconsciously, glided into French, with which she seemed more conversant.

"Have you always lived in the village?" I inquired, with as small regard for the conventionalities as she herself displayed.

She looked at me deprecatingly through her silky lashes, and laughed a mocking little laugh.

"What an idea!" she cried. "I would now be dead if that were so. It is not life here. It is only to breathe like this"—and she sighed audibly.

Then for a while she was silent, with her eyes fixed on the water in a musing, dreamy gaze.

"Ah, monsieur, that marriage was a great mistake," she announced at last, facing me suddenly; "my father and mother. He had only his handsome face, and mamma was an orphan—and now see how we must work. Sans doute, Jean is much better as a husband."

"Who is Jean?" I asked.

"Ah, Jean!" with a shrug of her dainty shoulders. "Jean? He is—but it is time to go. Mamma will be waiting for me, and unless I work to-day I will have no baskets to sell to-morrow. Won't you come along with me?"

I needed no second invitation, and we strolled away side by side. The fields lay steeped in golden sunshine, the sky was as blue as a summer harebell, and the air full of a strange, soft radiance. The mellow tones of a distant church bell drifted across the water, and fainter yet fainter, floated on and on, until the last echo had hidden itself in the reeds along the shore.

"Won't you tell me about Jean?" I persisted.

"Why, Jean—Jean! I'm going to marry Jean next month," she told me, while a swift blush dyed her face.

"Then Jean is a very fortunate fellow," I replied. "But who is he? Where is he?"

In the silence that ensued I had time to study her face. There was passion lurking in her dusky eyes, and the crimson burned under the olive of her cheeks.

"Ah!" she said presently, with a quick turn of her head that brought to mind a little robin red-breast, "you English, monsieur, you think too much of marriage—ce n'est pas le fin. There is much afterwards. Should I wish Pierre to see me when I am ill, and old, and ugly? He will wear me in his heart, and there I shall always be young and beautiful.

"And perhaps—Bah! how I hate work! When I should like to float on the lake and dream, it is mamma that cries that I must gather birch-bark and sweet hay for more baskets and workboxes. Then, too, I have to dye the quills with which to trim them; and Jean, he has a house, and a cow, and two horses, and three thousand dollars," pausing impressively as she enumerated each piece of property. "But Pierre is only a soldier. Ma foi! But he is a fine fellow—tall and straight, like a young tree, and such big blue eyes."

"Do you love Pierre?" I queried.

"Well, yes," with a touch of resignation in her tone.

"And you say he loves you, too?"

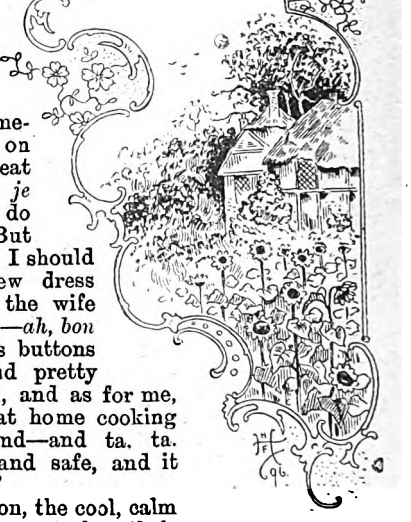
There was a slight quiver about her rosy lips, and she laughed a tuneless little laugh.

"Yes," she answered, "but what is the good of that, monsieur? He is poor—so poor—only a soldier, with a sword and a uniform, and——" she gazed up at me with her lustrous eyes that were dark and flashing, like the eyes of the women of Seville.

There was a wondrous blending of softness and fire in her face, and I marvelled as I looked at her, why the eccentric brain of this dainty, bird-like creature, innocent of any knowledge of angles and triangles, should fly off at a tangent, busy with the problem of life that is so difficult of solution.

We were in sight of her small cottage now, with the waving millet up to its very door. It looked like a tiny island in a big, restless sea.

"One must live, monsieur," she announced, parenthetically, with an impatient little moue, "and see, this is not life. Pierre, he spoke to me the day before he went away, but I knew he loved me before he said a word. There was something in his eyes when he looked into mine that cried out so loud that I thought everybody must hear it, and when he kissed me that first time, and said, 'Lorita, I love you,' it was all old to me even then, and I laughed, but something was laying on my heart like a great weight. Ah, que je suis folle! Why do I talk to you so? But what could I do? I should never have a new dress when I would be the wife of Pierre, and then—ah, bon Dieu! A soldier's buttons are so bright, and pretty girls smile at him, and as for me, why I would be at home cooking and scrubbing, and—and ta. ta. Jean, he is ugly and safe, and it is much better so."



The quiet decision, the cool, calm dignity of her remarks—their audacity was staggering. I passed my hand across my eyes, and looked at her again as she threaded her way in front of me along the narrow path.

"And next month you are to marry Jean," I said, as we reached the cottage door. "I believe you will change your mind yet, and take Pierre. I would, if I were you."

She shook her head and tapped the ground impatiently with one of her arched brown feet.

"Non, non," she asserted emphatically. "I am not a coquette. I will marry Jean." And she raised her eyebrows ever so little.

"May I come to see you again before I leave? I hope Jean is not jealous."

"He could not be of you," she cried, laughing, and flashing back one of her radiant smiles, as she looked at me with those mischievous, haunting eyes.

The captain had spoken truly. There was, indeed, little of interest to see at the village. The Indians (all half-breeds) were lazy, shiftless creatures, weak imitations of the white man.

"I am disappointed," I said to the shopkeeper, who was lounging in the door, with his stiff black hair pompadoured. "I came here expecting to find wigwams, wampum, and war-paint."

The man laughed.

"You might not have got home with your scalp," he replied, "if that were so."

The children stared at me stolidly, some half-grown boys were playing baseball, and in the back of the shop

I heard a baby crying. After buying a half-dozen baskets and tiny birch-bark canoes (I had engaged as many more from Lorita,) I turned my face to the lake.

Lorita and her mother—a bright-faced, Frenchy little woman—were engaged in an animated discussion as I neared their cottage, and I passed by unobserved. As I went down the little path between the millet I heard Lorita laugh, and there was a suggestion in it of the carol of a bird.

"So she is going to marry Jean for his money," kept running through my mind like a refrain, "because he owns a house, a cow, two horses, and three thousand dollars."

It was the same old strain, on a lower key. Women have sold themselves since the world began, but the blank dreariness of the girl's future appalled me.

I tossed away my cigar in disgust.

Two days later I received a letter calling me home unexpectedly, and the evening before my departure I went to bid Lorita good-bye.

The girl—she was scarcely more than a child—attracted me, interested me. Such quaint, sordid axioms from such guileless lips!

The air was fresh with that delicious fragrance of the woods after a shower, and the mist, like a grey spectre, floated up from the lake, and away. The odour of birch-bark and sweet hay seemed to hang about the cottage, like a visible presence, and the rustling millet nodded and whispered without ceasing.

In the doorway I found Lorita, pale and troubled, but she extended to me a brown, delicately-modelled little hand as I paused upon the steps, and greeted me with her characteristic, insouciant smile. Then her beautiful face, as capricious as an April day, again relapsed into sadness.

"Ah, it is too bad," she began, with a sob in her voice, "that it should happen so. Jean, he tries to please me. He came yesterday to bring the great trunk of wedding clothes from Montreal. You see, I would have it so, for it is there that we used to live, and there is nothing to buy at Bobcaygeon."

She spoke so rapidly that her words tripped over one another, in their undue haste.

"Such silks and laces, monsieur. Ah, but I shall look like a princess with them on"—with a fleeting smile, and a bird-like poise of her head. "But mamma and I were looking through them, and Jean, who insisted that he must see, too, he sat down beside us, and in a moment he was asleep: Bah! only fancy! And he snored frightfully, but that was all the better, for then we might say what we liked, and mamma was sure that one dress was bon marché, for there was a spot as big as your button under the top ruffle."

With an unmirthful, pathetic laugh, she added:

"It was hidden, indeed, snug away, but mamma found it, for her eyes are sharp. Then I put on my wedding gown and pinned on the long white veil, monsieur, and I looked beautiful, like the little Mother in the church and when I turned from the mirror Pierre was standing in the door just here. The sun was shining on the buttons of his jacket, and he was where you are now, with his arms stretched out to me and his eyes half shut, under the shadow of his cap.

"Mamma was gone to show some lace to a neighbour, and I did not speak, but—but—what say you?

"The veil is not hurt, and it is dry again, but Pierre's tears and mine, ah, they fell on it very fast

"Suddenly he saw Jean—poor Jean!

"His mouth was open, so—and his nose was red like a cherry, and while he snored Pierre looked down at him and clinched his fists, and under my lace my heart was aching—throbbing."

Her bright changeful face grew soft and tender as she spoke, and the rosy glow deepened on her cheeks.

"Ah, well, Pierre, he was gone when mamma came back, and you know Jean is rich—very rich—but something aches so here in my breast."

"So you are surely going to marry Jean next month? Good-bye, Lorita," I said, turning to go.

A sunbeam quivered across her exquisite face, and lingered lovingly in the tearful black eyes.

"It is better so," she answered, with a pitiful effort at a smile. "Pierre, he is gone away now, and—bon Dieu! The wedding dress is very fine! It is real brocade, mamma says—ah, it is destiny, monsieur—destiny!"

As I reached the gate I heard her sobbing, and looking back I saw her, with arms outstretched, like a broken bright-hued lily, lying across the threshold.

I scarcely knew whether to weep or smile.

CHAPTER XX.

In Quest of Quitzaal.

On the morrow I sought out Marenso. I told him who our prisoner was, and, as briefly as I could, the story of our illicit love. He listened gravely, interposing sundry headshakes into his silence, and when I asked his counsel regarding my duty, answered, after long communing with himself, that the Princess must go before the Queen as a prisoner and a rebel, and receive from the royal lips her sentence. To this I agreed, as it had been in my mind to do the same, for it is a coward's act to slay a helpless woman, however dangerous she may be.

"Then into your charge I commit our fair prisoner," said I, "and shall trust you to take her safely to court. It would be well were you to set out on the return journey with most of the troops at once, as with a chosen band I intend to track down Quitzaal before I go back."

"A foolish plan," said Marenso regretfully. "If the white rebels are destroyed, there are teeming hosts of Red Barbarians left in their trackless woods."

"None but what have heard or will hear of our prowess," I said, "and few who came against us yesterday will dare to face us again. Give me five hundred stout-hearted, well-armed men, and I will wager to capture this runaway Governor, and bring him down to the coast in safety."

"Well, well," he replied, "your blood is young blood and mine is old, much as I rejoice in the sound of war! Have your way and I will go; but let your force be a thousand strong, and let Valdo and Atris go with you. Then only shall I dare to meet the Queen alone."

To these conditions I consented, and the day but two following, having by then buried our dead and razed the town to the ground—excepting the pyramid, wherein we placed the corpses of Alcis, Cuzcon, and others who had done nobly in the fight—and shared up the food and spoil, our forces parted, Marenso, with 24,000 men, beginning his march to the coast, and I, with the other thousand and my two lieutenants, striking out and following the trail of the Ulmecs, with whom Quitzaal had last been seen.

For some distance our way led through level country intersected by little rippling water courses, through forests where the air was heavy with the rich perfume of summer flowers and the crisp scent of dry timber. In places we found clearings where once had been a settlement, now abandoned or used only as a burial ground, where the bodies were interred, as is the native custom, in a sitting posture.

One of these places of the dead we saw not far from our camp, and there, it seemed, had been hurriedly interred many of the slain in the recent battle, put into the ground in the usual way, but with many of the heads sticking out of the soft earth, some scratched and dragged out and gnawed and mangled fearfully by the roaming denizens of the forest—the tiger-cats and wolfish wild dogs that made night hideous with their howlings and barkings.

A gruesome spot it was, even in the daylight hours, with its skull-like brows projecting from the soil in silent horror, chawed and chavelled out of all likeness to humanity; with its polished bones lying scattered about, rooted up by the sharp claws of the beasts and cleaned of every scrap of flesh by their savage fangs; with its many useless and broken weapons, chiefly knives and swords of obsidian, that hard transparent stone, so common in that country; with its mute but telling evidence of sad defeat and carnage. Quickening our pace, we left the grim spectacle behind as soon as possible.

Our course now lay through fields of maize and beans and fertile stretches of fruit-plants and productive trees; through districts rich in amber, cocoa, cochineal, and lime; round hillsides bored with tunnels, where dusky workers delved for lead and tin and copper, and here and there for silver and turquoise stones; and further on, still following the trail of the fleeing Ulmecs—which was easily traced by their footprints, the state of the fruit crops and the white ashes of their camp fires—we came to rising ground again, climbing out of the valley up one of its southern slopes, meeting on our upward journey the pines and larches and oaks that told of the chill air of that higher altitude. Now and again we crossed a foaming torrent, swollen by recent rains, getting over on rude wooden bridges laid from rock to rock. It taxed our nerves to the utmost to walk along those rough-hewn logs, poised so lightly on the points of rock that jutted sheer out of the boiling flood beneath; but, save three who fell off and were swept away in the rapid currents, we made the transits in safety.

Anon we passed by mighty ruins, half buried beneath dense forests; palaces crumbling to dust; temples with grinning, sculptured idols before altars covered with nearly effaced bas-reliefs; houses of granite, black and rose-colour, rough and polished, all falling to decay, overgrown with twining creepers and rank weeds, resplendent with the gay flashing of the brightly-plumaged birds and resonant with the tuneful notes of the sweeter-voiced, if less gaudy, songsters of the shade. What race of men was it that built these fast-declining edifices, so soon to be blotted out of existence by the ruthless hand of Time?

'Tis a riddle that the centuries may not answer. The few Huacans we captured on our journey could tell us no more concerning them than that it was a tradition of their tribe that long ago their forefathers, the first Huacans, had driven these unknown people, who came from the land to the west, beyond the sea—out of the valley to a country further south, as the Ulmecs might some day drive them. When asked why Quitzaal and the Ulmecs with him had gone south instead of north to their own nation, our prisoners answered very ingenuously: because the white chief thought to evade any pursuit, expecting we should strike northward. Up to now I had had several brushes with the natives, who fought in the undergrowth instead of facing us in the open, covering themselves with leaves so as to be invisible while pouring in a volley of arrows, but after getting all the knowledge I could out of the captives I set them at liberty, with a word to their fellows that I wanted the white chief Quitzaal only, and that when he was once in my clutches I would leave the land to them. From that time, with such amazing quickness news spreads in those desolate wilds, our march was unmolested.

Continuing our journey on the plateau we reached after leaving the lovely valley, we found that at length the fugitives had wind of our coming, and were pressing forward with greater speed and caution, though it could avail them little, being then but a day's distance ahead. At last we came to a halt on the brink of a deep cleft in the ground that extended to either side of us as far as our gaze could reach. It was a gorge too wide to warrant the hazard of a leap, and yet so narrow in proportion to its depth that it seemed but a long, deep gash in the earth, as though some giant had drawn his blade across the old world's face, leaving an ugly mark behind. At the bottom of this precipitous rift ran a river, reduced to our eyes, by the giddy height, to a brawling stream. A couple of huge trees, growing at the very top, whose gnarled boughs interlocked, were the only means of passage over this fearsome obstacle.

"Quitzaal and his band must have passed over," I said; "and what others can do, so can we. I, for one, shall cross. You, Atris, with five hundred men, I shall leave here to guard the place, on which the safety of our return depends, the rest must follow me."

So saying, I wasted no further time, but securing my weapons firmly, began to climb the massive trunk of the nearmost tree, and up into its stout branches, until I firmly grasped the twining arms of the further giant oak. Here, amongst the scant foliage I paused and looked down into the awful abyss that yawned beneath. There the great river flowed like a thin line of shining silver, inlaid in dark, dull ebony, and the sound of its rolling, as it washed its rocky bed, floated faintly to my ears, like the far-off sighing of a summer breeze.

Some might have lost head and dizzily fallen, but Phrena the Iron-Fingered was not of them, and so I came across in safety. After me Valdo cautiously crept, warily avert his eyes from the emptiness beneath, and he, too, reached the far side. Then others followed, though hesitatingly and grumblingly, till a score stood with us on the coveted brink. When the twenty-third man had nearly reached the middle, however, he looked down with morbid curiosity, trembled a second on his lofty perch like an aspen, strove in vain to keep his hold, and then, with a piercing cry of despair, unloosed his fingers, and fell headlong into the horrible depths. Down, down he sank like a stone, his armour-clad form flashing in the sunlight like a falling star as he descended between those frowning walls of living rock, and plunged into the swiftly-flowing torrent beneath. Breathlessly we peered over the dread verge and saw his body disappear, the only sound that reached us being a tiny splash, as of a little pebble idly thrown in a purling brook.

Now the rest hung back, fearful of his fate, but came on at my urging till forty were over, when another missed foothold and fell like the first, with a shriek of terror, into the fast-rolling flood at the base of the silent cliffs. Then they refused, one and all, to stir one step on that bridge, nor could I, either by threats, or entreaties, or curses, or badinage, or sneers, make them alter their resolution.

"Stay there, then, for ever, cowards, men with the hearts of women! Stay there till you rot as you stand!" I cried in anger. "I and this brave company will pursue our quest though the very spirits bar our way. You, Atris, leave them and come with me, lest you be disgraced by the taint of their foolish weakness."

Izitla's lover obeyed as though he had been told to go aboard a ship, and when he joined us I gave the word and we continued our journey without so much as a moment's pause to give the faint hearts time to screw up their courage, soon getting out of their sight, and quickly picking up the trail of the rebels. The chase was now further in front than before, and it was with difficulty that we made it out as it wound through dense thickets of cypress and clustering groves of cedar, through belts of fragrant pine, over bare and storm-swept spaces, down shrub-fringed gullies, and up the steep sides of snow-clad mountain spurs.

More than one startling adventure and narrow escape we had on those ice-bound ridges and overhanging crests of sparkling crystal; more than one hairbreadth saving from slips that would have sent us churning up the crusted snow down glittering slopes on our way to white-hung, death-still hollows opening out in awing vastness underneath our feet! The men I had, brave as they were, often wished I would turn back, but doggedly I held on. I had not got so far for nothing, and where the foe could find a footway so could we; therefore on we went through that region of rock-waste and snowy solitude, with mountains piled on mountains towering round us, white-mantled, tapering peaks jutting up into the cold, clear blue of the sky on every side, bare, black, rounded hills and sharp angular crags, strewn about in inextricable confusion, soaring heights and yawning depths in close proximity, precipices sheer and slanting ledges winding side by side, cloud-draped summit and mist-filled valleys lying near together, and over all, the calm, chill stillness of eternal peace, broken only now and then by the hoarse cries of the eagles and condors that whirled in wheeling flight high above the dreary scene.

With feelings of relief we left that icy land behind, and after travelling for many days along a level sandy country, came to the refuge that the fugitives were making for, and ran them to earth as well-trained dogs tire out and run down their fleeter-footed quarry. It was in a region more desolately grand, more melancholy, yet more vast, than any tract of mother earth that I have seen in all my wanderings.

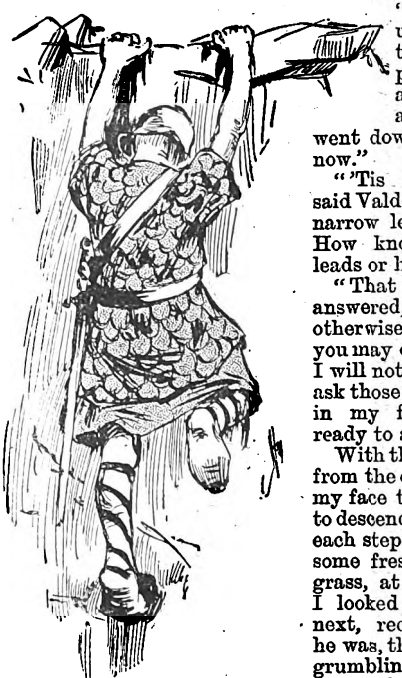
Imagine, if you can, an arid table-land of lime and sandstone rock, breeze-blown, and scantily covered with vegetation, broken up in all directions by gaping cracks and fissures, thousands of cubits deep and inaccessibly steep, with rivers rolling over gritty beds at the bottom of these great ravines; imagine, wherever a depression was that could be called a valley, sloping paths that led from height to height, seeming, on the great, square-shouldered earth masses, like lines drawn with a finely-pointed spear.

Imagine these valleys to be few but the dark, awesome gorges many, and think of these as cut sheer down through alternating layers of limestone crag and ruddy sandstone cliff, with strata of shale and clay between, and think of these soft beds as worn away by wet and weather into deep, delving ledges and rounded caves, on which, and in which, houses, forts, and towns, were built and peopled by a strange, retiring race of dusky natives. Imagine these smooth, bare cliffs, darkly facing each other, to be dotted by rudely cut footholds and spider-webbed by long, frail ladders fastened to the stone, by which dangerous and tedious means these people reached their rat-like haunts and descended to the narrow strip of sand at the river's edge beneath; imagine here and there along the ledges, on jutting curvatures of rock and along the skyward brinks of the highways of this land, dense clumps and belts of mammoth cedars larger than are grown elsewhere on earth; picture to yourself all this and you will know what manner of country it was* wherein Quitzaal sought safety, and wherein he found it not.

Up one of the winding, thread-like paths we had wearily toiled at the close of a dry and scorching day, under a sky of pitiless blue, and exhausted, outworn, were preparing to make a blissful sleep in the welcome shades of night, when, advancing to the edge of a chasm that opened out not many paces from our camping place, I saw, looking down, a sight that gladdened my heart and made me forget my weariness.

Along a narrow ledge which, starting from where I stood, wound down by long, slow gradations, the rebel Governor and a hundred Ulmecs were softly stealing, one by one, and one by one vanishing into the black darkness that already filled the lower depths, though on the mountain tops the red twilight still lingered. I watched them disappear into the rising mist of night, then called the others together, and told them what I had seen and the plan I had formed.

"We must follow them under cover of the night," I said. "They would see us in the light of to-morrow, and pick us off with arrows, one after another, as we went down. We must go now."



My other foot found a hole.

"'Tis a daring thing," said Valdo, "to descend the narrow ledge in the night. How know we where it leads or how it ends?"

"That we shall find," I answered, "if we go—not otherwise. I go, and lead; you may or may not follow; I will not command; I only ask those who dare, to tread in my footsteps and be ready to act as I wish."

With that I swung myself from the edge, and, keeping my face to the cliff, began to descend crabwise, making each step sure by clutching some fresh root, or tuft of grass, at every movement. I looked up. Atris came next, reckless fellow that he was, then Valdo, though grumbling as he came that he liked it not, then half a score of the soldiers, and then no more.

"Stay where you are till our return, weak hearts," I said, as low as I could talk, "and fear not for our safety till you see us brought up dead!"

Then the night closed round us also, and down into the unknown deep we crept, step by step, pace by pace, feeling our way along that slanting projection in the midst of silence solemn and darkness profound. Down—down—I went, the others creeping after with many a whispered word of caution and courage, till, when I thought we had travelled leagues upon leagues of distance, my right foot, extended onward for its next step, trod on empty air, and I realised that the ledge came to an abrupt end.

"Halt!" I passed on the word to my comrades; and reflecting that if our enemies had gone down here, we, too, must find a way. After a moment's pause I went down on my knees there in the awful, silent blackness, slowly let my body over the edge of the projecting rock, and kicked about with my feet for a foothold which would tell me that a rough stairway here led further down. It was a terrible moment, and but that I knew the strength of my iron-grasp, I should not have held on so long. As it was, finding the cliff-face hard and smooth, and discovering no inlet for my foot to rest upon, I faltered for a space and, hanging there, looked up.

Night had now fallen alike on mountain-tops and in the darkening hollows, but above my head—it seemed a great way off—a narrow riband of golden stars shone out on a ground of inky black, gleaming and twinkling down upon me in merry unconcern, each glittering point of light standing out from its neighbours as I had seen them in my vision of Isis. Like a lightning flash my thoughts passed from that vision to the words of Unim, the priest, that he had twice told me in the Sacred Grotto of the Sleeper: "Till thou hast been here a third time, fear not death." New courage and hope came back to me then, and looking up once more at the strip of shining stars I thought they glanced down now with a kindly smile rather than a gay indifference, and even as I gazed my left foot, scratching the rocky wall, found a place wherein to lodge. A little to the right, a little lower down, my other foot found a hole in the cliff, and I knew I was at the top of a rude stairway. Climbing up again, I told my companions, and, bidding them follow me, descended again till my head was level with the topmost cavity. Atris came next, and as he hung over the verge, vainly trying to find his foothold, I seized his legs and placed them in the right position, then receded out of the way.

Each one thus guiding the feet of those who came after, we slowly and laboriously went down that invisible stair into the chasm. I had counted fifty footholes passed in this way when suddenly, without an instant's warning, a rumbling and rattling of boulders and dislodged earth, accompanied by a yell of terror so wild and unearthly that it made our hearts stand still, followed by a dull splash, and then another shriek of fright and another splash, rose up out of the dark deep below, the noise and echo of the fearful sounds vibrating dismally in the vasty space. Then all was still again—silent and gloomy as the grave, save for the murmur of the river as it wound along its sandy channel far beneath. Two of our foes had missed their hold and fallen into the stream.

Not one of us dared to speak, as, with bated breath and shaken nerves, we continued our mad descent till, with an exclamation of relief, I felt my feet rest on the topmost rung of a cedar-wood ladder, firmly fastened to the rock. Down this, with quickened pace and fresh zeal, we stepped, finding ourselves, when at its lower end, upon a broad landing-place under the shelter of an overhanging crag. I would have gone on down a sloping path to the right, that I thought I could make out, but the soldiers, one and all, refused.

"We have come far enough," Valdo said, even his rough voice trembling a little; "let us stay here till dawn."

"So say I," urged reckless Atris; "in the light we can at least see our way."

"So be it, then," I said, yielding, and posting myself on the right to guard against any sudden surprise from below, I told them to get what sleep they could. For myself I could not close my eyes, though to do so would have been a welcome relief from the sight of the overpowering darkness that encompassed me, rendered all the darker by contrast with that narrow ribbon of twinkling stars overhead, like an arch of golden spray flung over a gulf of gloom. So I sat and watched it with weary head until the far-off ravine top began to glow with a pale pink light, that broadened and brightened with wonderfully soft gradations till the stars vanished, and the edges of the gully stood out sharp and clear against the sunlit sky. But down there in the gorge night lasted longer, nor could we see our way until an hour had passed since dawn.

Then we saw, by the spectral light that filtered down, that we stood at the top of a sloping path that led to a large settlement of the cliff dwellers, whose cedar-wood houses were grouped together in a large hollow in the rock face. Also, bargaining with the inhabitants, we saw Quitzaal and his ninety and odd Ulmecs just at the foot of the dizzy path. They saw us at the instant we saw them, and one of the Ulmecs, a long-limbed savage, drew bow and sent me a shaft which splintered against the stone on which I stood.

"Two can play at that game!" I cried, "and I will teach these rebels that I am not called the Slinger for nothing! You, men, give them a volley, but avoid the Governor, and try not to injure the cliff people."

They answered me by sending a deadly volley amongst the exposed troop, whilst I managed to hit and topple over the clumsy giant who had shot at me, and, thrown into confusion, the whole band broke into a run, and passing the village, came to bay on a little platform, from whence a long ladder fell straight to the river's edge. Down this ladder the hurried rebels began to scramble thoughtlessly; it broke beneath their weight, and, taking over a score of them with it, collapsed into the foaming torrent, and was swept away. The quarry we had hunted down so long and doggedly, was now delivered into our hands. Running past the cliff-dwellings we thirteen attacked them without a moment's pause, and though they numbered over sixty, had much the best of the struggle, having choice of ground to retreat, whereas with them to step backwards meant instant death.

The Ulmecs stoutly resisted my efforts to reach the Governor, but "Sunderer" proved an irresistible talisman, and hewing my way through with the good blade, I at last got him separated and engaged him hand to hand. He was older than I, and more cautious, but so used had I become by this time to all the tricks and twists of swordcraft, that I soon obtained the mastery, and could have slain him a dozen times had I wished. But I was weary of killing, and meant no more than to take him prisoner, so that the Queen could pass sentence upon him, and make his degradation a warning to all others who might meditate similar revolt. He, divining my intention, strove hard to cripple me by one foul blow, and finding that in vain, lost his coolness, threw away his weapon, and sprang upon me suddenly in a mad effort to bear me with him over the platform's edge.

"Ha!" I cried, "you surely forget, Sir Governor, that I was once named the Iron-fingered, and that on board the Ravager, when I was but twenty, I could hold a man out at arm's length!" and getting a good grip of him round the waist, despite his frantic struggles, lifted him clear off his feet and dragged him away from the dangerous brink. In so doing, so great was his frenzied resistance, I felt "Sunderer" escape my hold and heard it slide along the sloping ledge and fall into the abyss. Calling to Valdo to seize the Governor, I disengaged myself roughly from his embrace and sprang to the verge to see the last of my dear and true comrade of steel. So quickly did I spring that I was in time to see it glancing from a jutting limestone crag, chipping off a piece as it glanced, and clanging thence down a shelving sandstone slope towards the river. I gave a cry of despair when I thus beheld Mitres' priceless gift, as I thought, doomed to be lost in the current, but next moment was so relieved as to give vent to an exclamation of delight. The matchless sword, as though conscious of its repute and aware of the great deeds it had yet to do, wriggled as it slipped like a living thing, and just when its hilt touched the water, caught by its point between two inequalities in the red rock, and there lay, out of my reach, but within my sight.

Now I turned to ward off a blow that one of the Ulmecs aimed at me, and in so doing felt a quick fiery pain in my back, and knew that another foe had driven his weapon into me. Striking down the savage in front with a fierce stroke, I twisted myself half-round so sharply that the blade quivering in my back was wrenched from the grasp of its owner, and so roughly that as I turned I saw him lurch forward, and then disappear over the awful brink. Then, seized with a sudden faintness, I fell upon the ledge, Atris stepping over me barely soon enough to avert a dozen hovering swords. With a swift jerk he pulled the rankling blade from my flesh, and heedless of the barbarians who beset him, bound up the gaping wound as well as he was able. Then he gently turned me on my back, and picking me up in his arms, bore me up to the ledge, away from the fight, staggering under my weight as he went, but holding bravely on, in spite of the steep ascent, the narrow track, and the darts that whistled after him.

Looking over his shoulder, though feeling as one in a dream, and all things appearing to me in that guise, I could see Quitzaal lying bound upon the platform, while Valdo and five others were keeping the remaining Ulmecs at bay. As my preserver climbed heavily up the path, turning an angle in the cliff, I saw, glancing upwards, the thirty men who had refused to follow at sunset, coming down the long ladder with all the speed so awkward a means of transit would allow. Atris saw them, too, and called loudly for them to hasten, his voice sounding like the roaring of a cataract in my ears.

It was not many paces now to the cliff dwellings, and he stumbled on with almost superhuman strength that he might place me there in safety, for to leave me lower down would be to block the way. Loudly rang the wild yells of the infuriated Ulmecs along the rocky walls of that great ravine; loudly our friends, hurrying to our relief, called to us to be of good cheer; grimly stern Valdo, blood-stained, and dust-soiled from head to foot, held his own against the terrible odds; hoarsely my comrade of few words panted and groaned, as with faltering steps he bore my great weight up the dangerous declivity, the sweat standing in great beads upon him.

"Only a few more paces, brave Atris, only a little more endurance, and we shall reach the hamlet on the cliff—another staggering stride and we are there; he has placed me flat upon the cool rock, and, exhausted, sat down to regain his breath, and wipe his heated brow; there go the rescuers, running past us down the ledge—one, two, three—thirty of them, all told—now many faces cluster over me, pity in their gaze; many gentle hands are busied loosening my armour and tunic—some of them are women's faces, swart, but pleasing. Hark! there comes a sound of sharp fierce fighting from the unseen depths; it lasts a moment, then all is still, and all things swim before my eyes in a white cloud mist. Am I truly dead? Is this truly the Land of Shadows? And where is my magic blade?"

Thus my thoughts ran whilst they tended my hurts, and I glided into a dreamless sleep, nor did I know any more of what was happening around me till two suns had risen, and shone, and set, and a third was piercing the gloom o'erhead.

JUMBLED STORY No. 24. [See Page 754.

THE IDEA OF FLEN.

The detective curled up his long body on my sofa, and smoked my cigars with the keenest enjoyment. I implored him to relate one of his thrilling experiences.

The detective rose to his feet, and threw the end of his cigar in the fire.

The detective paused, with due regard to effect. I implored him to continue.

The detective paused for a moment, and gazed wistfully at his empty glass. I hastened to refill it.

"I will tell you a story of the very worst man I followed. All that is known for certain is that Scotland Yard, laid the matter before the police.

"At one time this man occupied a certain position that were lying at the side of the line. Without hands the effect might have been very serious.

"When we arrived at Lyndhurst, I was surprised in Society. That was before his true character approach her again.

"In the meanwhile the wedding bells rang out a mile from the station. I followed him cautiously.

"A nature like Evelyn Carrington's could, of doubt, of catching the first train to town. When he publicly announced, the fury of the rejected suitor "A scoundrel of the name of Carter.

"His love was of the kind that you writers so ventured to approach Mr. Egerton, and told him the line carefully, and then waited until it became the very eyes of the assembled company.

"Thus ended the life of the worst man that I ever have ever had the misfortune to meet," he said.

"That was the end of his social life."

"As I came to the station I saw that the special had disappeared. I assure you it did not take me quietly at the bride's country home at Lyndhurst, seriously alarmed, and, bringing them up to my hand on his arm. He swung round, and for a a little out-of-the-way village on the East Coast. In spite of the disguise, I recognised my man.

"When, on the top of this, the engagement of bridegroom had already taken their places. I communicate with my superiors. I found this easy became generally known. Incredible as it may seem making a detour, came out on the railway line about turns to hatred.

"One night there was a reception at the conservatory. That was the first act of the tragedy. Had they all been allowed to reach Miss Carrington's house. He found Miss Carrington alone in the work, for Carter spent most of his time in his rooms.

"You must understand that after the line leaves Carrington's, and Carter forced an entrance to the Lyndhurst Station it runs round a sharp curve, and he fell passionately in love with one of the purest knew."

"The wretched man threw open the carriage door to see him walk away in the opposite direction to to Liverpool Street Station.

"No sooner had Carter boarded the train, to destroy the bride and bridegroom on the very wedding-day approached his letters became so repulsive to the girl, and she forbade him ever to to shadow the man Carter day and night, and on the crash over the aqueduct, into the water below.

"Having laid the sleepers across the line Carter knew no bounds.

"As the train drew out from the platform I laid slightest suspicious movement on his part to Miss Carrington to the Hon. Charlie Egerton was and fairest girls that ever God created; this man stamp of Carter. Nevertheless, throughout a much difficulty he laid these across the line in such a rush for the retreating train, sprang on to the North."

"After this incident Carter began a long series thankful for having escaped my clutches, than he set out again for the station with the intention, no altogether surprised to find myself following Carter Carter was forcibly ejected by the butler before dawn of their married life."

"The train crossed the aqueduct, and bore the violent and threatening that the Hon. Egerton was London season he forced his attentions upon her. In the end, the very sight of the man became who was little more than a brute beast.

"This, then, was his diabolical plan of revenge; for Carter. A workman, with a bag of tools on his happy couple smoothly and swiftly away to the dusk before making his next move.

"The wedding ceremony was to take place quite course, have nothing in common with a man of the thoroughly appreciate; a love, when scorned, that of persecutions against Miss Carrington. As the train was preparing to start, and that the bride and telegraph office to have the train stopped.

"I will not attempt to describe the scene that footboard, and so into an empty carriage that had against the parapet, and then dropped like a stone man, and, believe me, they were not pleasant reading.

"My orders were clear and simple. I was told off When the eventful morning arrived I was not the Hall. He struck out across the fields, and man slip through my fingers. I rushed to the shoulder, was slouching up and down the platform.

"These letters were my first introduction to the Egerton. I saw the evil look in Carter's face, and then over an aqueduct that spans a large stretch of water, and so on to the North. Carter examined merrily. Evelyn Carrington became the Hon. Mrs. had all been done in an instant, but I had let the a way that a train rushing round the curve would been reserved for luggage. I stood stupefied. It remembered the sleepers that he had laid across the his. Then he shook me off, and with an oath made come to inevitable destruction, and in all probability moment looked at me with those piercing eyes of long to remove the sleepers. Then I followed him. that he had nothing to fear. Then I looked round presently watched him approach a pile of sleepers line. Already the train was nearing the fatal corner. and sprang out. His body shot with terrific force to the water.

THE CLEVER MADAME XAVIER.

MADAME XAVIER kept a shop at the end of the street. Such a tiny shop, with only one window to it and a bit of a counter piled high with bunches of gay yarn and boxes of cheap tinsels. There was a bird in a cage in madame's window which always sang furiously in the early morning, and a pot of mignonette in blossom adorned the sill.

Just across the road lived the sausage vendor, a little old man, who wore a wig, and dressed in snuff colour.

He was early at his post every morning frying sausages, but being cruelly afflicted with asthma, he could only speak in a loud, hoarse voice, so his daughter, Annette, a dream of health and beauty, would stand beside him in her neat stuff gown, and call in a voice as lusty as a chanticleer:

"Hot sausages! Hot sausages!"

Now, diagonally across, in the next street, was a tall brick building, used as a storehouse. Its lower rooms were piled with dusty white bags full of grain, over which the satin-coated mice frolicked and grew fat as the livelong day; but up in the top of the building was a large garret rented by a poverty-stricken artist.

Here were pictures strewn all about the room, while in the middle of it stood a large stout easel supporting a bare canvas. Every morning the artist crept down from his lofty quarters to buy hot sausages of M. Laubeau and to cast sly glances of intense regard at Annette, who, for her part, kept on at her calling as if there were no young men in the world.

But when he turned to go back to his garret then would Annette smile and toss her head, with its white cap, in a coquettish nod to the little madame across the road, as much as to say: "See, I have an admirer!" And madame would smile back, for she dearly loved a romance. Sometimes she would beckon to Annette, and when the girl ran lightly across the street the old woman would say:

"When will the wedding be?"

"Ugh!" Annette would answer. "Could I eat paint? I thrive now and am comfortable. Monsieur must make his fortune ere Annette weds him."

"And he shall do it," returned the little madame one day. "I will myself speak to monsieur."

That very day when the artist passed her shop with a canvas well wrapped in paper under his arm, the little Frenchwoman called to him. "Come in," she said. "Show me the picture."

Reluctantly he undid it, and disclosed a pensive-faced Madonna.

"Fi donc, monsieur!" exclaimed madame. "But she has a sickly look. I do not wonder you may not sell her. We have enough like her. Monsieur must paint different—something gay and cheerful—fresh, you know."

"I am too poor to hire a model," said the artist gloomily.

"Ah, truly," replied madame; "but suppose I could find a model. Would monsieur paint?"

"Perhaps."

She led the way through the tiny shop to a tinier living-room. There, in one corner, looking very big and clumsy, stood an oaken chest, with the lilies of France carved upon it. The old woman unfastened a key from her chatelaine, and knelt before the chest. She paused.

"Monsieur must know," she said gravely, "long ago in France my people were not poor, but rich. That was before the Revolution, monsieur, before their names were knitted into the cruel Madame's stocking. They fell. We have always been poor enough since. Ce coffre contains my great-grandmère's ball gown. Monsieur shall see."

She unlocked the chest, and lifted a covering of tissue paper, shook out a rich white satin gown, heavily embroidered with pale blue forget-me-nots. The stomacher was thickly sewn with seed pearls, and wide ruffles of rare old lace edged the neck.

The artist gave a cry of admiration: "A costume of the time of Louis XVI. How exquisite!"

"Here are her slippers," continued madame, holding up a pair of white satin slippers adorned with tarnished gold buckles, "and these are the gloves she wore. To think I have them yet, monsieur, and my great-grandmère dust these one hundred years! We might have sold her toilet over and over again when we were hungry and cold, but we always preferred to suffer for my grandmère's sake. Listen, monsieur. Little Annette across the street—you love her. I have seen so. She has a heart as sweet as a nut, and as bonny a face as ever the sunshine kissed. If I put these robes upon her she will look like une grande dame, fit for monsieur's brush. She will be fresh like a rose, and as beautiful. She shall be monsieur's model, and will make his fortune."

That night, then, the sausage vendor took in his stand. Annette, free at last, slipped across the road, and the old madame robed the girl in the grand toilet and fastened her soft, fluffy curls in a knot high on her head with a quaint tortoise-shell comb. Wrapped in cloaks, the two stole down the street and entered the tall building. They threaded their way among the dusty bags, scaring the satin-coated mice, and climbed the stairs to the artist's studio.

When his eyes fell upon the vision of loveliness madame presented to him they shone with a new light. Love? Well, part love and part artistic rapture, but in either case Annette was the cause. The little Frenchwoman clapped her hands and laughed joyfully.

Always during the sittings madame sat decorously by, knitting industriously, but keeping open a sharp eye, as became a good chaperon. Not the slightest symptom of love-making escaped her. The portrait grew beneath the brush as if the very fairy of good luck had lent her spell to the artist. Never had his palette glowed with such colours, nor had such hitherto impossible tints blossomed forth. Every detail of the fresh young face became familiar to him, until at last from the canvas looked forth the sausage vendor's daughter in the grand dame's robes as beautiful as the proudest lady in the land.

"I can do no more," sighed the artist. Then madame arose, and, taking the girl by the hand, led her towards the door. "Monsieur has no longer need of us," she exclaimed. "Adieu!"

But the artist would not have it so. He pushed past the old Frenchwoman and stood before the girl.

"I love you, Annette," he cried. "Will you not marry me?"

"Tut, tut," said madame. "You must first speak to M. Laubeau. We will have no bold English manners here. If he consents, then Annette may think of you. Come, Annette."

It was, indeed, true that the little madame had brought good luck to the poor artist. The portrait was sent to a picture dealer. In less than a week it was sold, and orders had come through the dealer enough to set the artist busy. He went to thank the old Frenchwoman.

"The good people like something fresh," said madame. "Monsieur might have sat in his garret and pined and been melancholy until he died. Good luck would have had none of him. One must be brave and smile to win fortune."

"I owe everything to you," said the grateful young man.

"Ah, true!" returned madame nonchalantly; "but, tell me, have you yet won M. Laubeau's consent?"

"Alas! he refuses me Annette's hand! He will give me no reason."

"We must learn," said the madame, and leaning far out of the window of her tiny shop, she beckoned frantically to the sausage vendor across the road. He came, followed by Annette.

"Why is it M. Laubeau refused his daughter to the young monsieur who loves her truly?" inquired the Frenchwoman.

"I could not get on without Annette," grumbled the old man. "There would be none to cry out 'Sausages!'"

"True, true," said madame; "but must the young people be unhappy for this?"

"I am old," continued the sausage vendor, "and I have but Annette. If I yield her to the young monsieur, who will care for me?"

"Let me think," said the Frenchwoman. "Ah, I have it! 'Tis well to be comfortable in one's old age, and a companion is useful. If M. Laubeau wishes it, I will reconsider the proposal he made me years ago. He shall fetch the sausage stand across the road and set it here—in front of my shop. The priest shall make us one, and I myself will cry 'Hot Sausages!'"

The Mirror

THERE was once a kingdom where mirrors were unknown. They had all been broken and reduced to fragments by order of the Queen, and if the tiniest bit of looking-glass had been found in any house, she would not have hesitated to put all the inmates to death with the most frightful tortures.

Now for the secret of this extraordinary caprice. The Queen was dreadfully ugly, and she did not wish to be exposed to the risk of meeting her own image; and knowing herself to be hideous, it was a consolation to know that other women at least could not see that they were p retty.

You may imagine that the young girls of the country were not at all satisfied. What was the use of being beautiful if you could not admire yourself?

They might have used the brooks and lakes for mirrors; but the Queen had foreseen this, and had hidden all of them under closely joined flagstones. Water was drawn from wells so deep that it was impossible to see the liquid surface, and shallow basins must be used instead of buckets, because in the latter there might be reflections. Such a dismal state of affairs, especially for the pretty coquettes, who were no more rare in this country than in others.

The Queen had no compassion, being well content that her subjects should suffer as much annoyance from the lack of a mirror as she felt at the sight of one.

* * * *

However, in a suburb of the city there lived a young girl named Jacinta, who was a little better off than the rest, thanks to her sweetheart, Valentin. For if someone thinks you are beautiful, and loses no chance to tell you, he is almost as good as a mirror.

"Tell me the truth," she would say; "what is the colour of my eyes?"

"They are dewy forget-me-nots."

"And my skin is not quite black?"

"You know that your forehead is whiter than freshly fallen snow, and your cheeks are like blush roses."

"How about my lips?"

"Cherries are pale beside them."

"And my teeth, if you please?"

"Grains of rice are not as white."

"But my ears, should I be ashamed of them?"

"Yes, if you would be ashamed of two little pink shells among your pretty curls."

And so on endlessly; she delighted, he, still more charmed, for his words came from the depth of his heart; and she had the pleasure of hearing herself praised, he, the delight of seeing her. So their love grew more deep and tender every hour, and the day that he asked her to marry him, she blushed, certainly, but it was not with anger. But, unluckily, the news of their happiness reached the wicked Queen, whose only pleasure was to torment others, and Jacinta more than anyone else, on account of her beauty.

* * * * *

A little while before the marriage Jacinta was walking in the orchard one evening, when an old crone approached, asking for alms, but suddenly jumped back with a shriek as if she had stepped on a toad, crying:

"Heavens, what do I see?"

"What is the matter, my good woman? What is it you see? Tell me."

"The ugliest creature I ever beheld."

"Then you are not looking at me," said Jacinta, with innocent vanity.

"Alas! yes, my poor child, it is you. I have been a long time on this earth, but never have I met anyone so hideous as you!"

Digitized by Google

"What! Am I ugly?"

"A hundred times uglier than I can tell you."

"But my eyes——"

"They are a sort of dirty grey; but that would be nothing if you had not such an outrageous squint!"

"My complexion——"

"It looks as if you had rubbed coal-dust on your forehead and cheeks."

"My mouth——"

"It is pale and withered like a faded flower."

"My teeth——"

"If the beauty of teeth is to be large and yellow, I never saw any so beautiful as yours."

"But, at least, my ears——"

"They are so big, so red, and so misshapen, under your coarse elf-locks, that they are revolting. I am not pretty myself, but I should die of shame if mine were like them." After this last blow, the old witch, having repeated what the Queen had taught her, hobbled off, with a harsh croak of laughter, leaving poor Jacinta dissolved in tears, prone on the ground beneath the apple trees.

* * * * *

Nothing could divert her mind from her grief. "I am ugly—I am ugly," she repeated constantly. It was in vain that Valentin assured and reassured her with the most vehement oaths.

"Let me alone! you are lying out of pity. I understand it all now; you never loved me; you are only sorry for me. The beggar woman had no interest in deceiving me. It is only too true—I am ugly. I do not see how you can endure the sight of me."

To undeceive her, he brought people from far and near; every man declared that Jacinta was created to delight the eyes; even the women said as much, though they were less enthusiastic. But the poor child persisted in her conviction that she was a repulsive object, and when Valentin pressed her to name their wedding day—"I, your wife!" cried she. "Never! I love you too dearly to burden you with a being so hideous as I am." You can fancy the despair of the poor fellow so sincerely in love. He threw himself on his knees, he prayed, he supplicated; she answered still that she was too ugly to marry him.

What was he to do? The only way to give the lie to the old woman and to prove the truth to Jacinta was to put a mirror before her. But there was no such thing in the kingdom, and so great was the terror inspired by the Queen, that no workman dared make one.

"Well, I shall go to Court," said the lover, in despair. "Harsh as our mistress is, she cannot fail to be moved by the tears and the beauty of Jacinta. She will retract, for a few hours at least, this cruel edict which has caused our trouble."

It was not without difficulty that he persuaded the young girl to let him take her to the palace. She did not like to show herself, and asked of what use would be a mirror, only to impress her more deeply with her misfortune; but when he wept, her heart was moved, and she consented, to please him.

* * * * *

"What is all this?" said the wicked Queen. "Who are these people, and what do they want?"

"Your Majesty, you have before you the most unfortunate lover on the face of the earth."

"Do you consider that a good reason for coming here to annoy me?"

"Have pity on me."

"What have I to do with your love affairs?"

"If you would permit a mirror——"

The Queen rose to her feet, trembling with rage. "Who dares to speak to me of mirrors?" she said, grinding her teeth.

"Do not be angry, your Majesty, I beg of you, and deign to hear me. This young girl whom you see before you, so fresh and pretty, is the victim of a strange delusion. She imagines that she is ugly."

"What is all this?" said the wicked Queen.

"Well," said the Queen, with a malicious grin, "she is right. I never saw a more hideous object."

Jacinta, at these cruel words, thought she would die of mortification. Doubt was no longer possible, she must be ugly. Her eyes closed, she fell on the steps of the throne in a dead swoon.

But Valentin was affected very differently. He cried out loudly that her Majesty must be mad to tell such a lie. He had no time to say more. The guards seized him, and at a sign from the Queen the headsman came forward. He was always beside the throne, for she might need his services at any moment.

"Do your duty," said the Queen, pointing out the man who had insulted her. The executioner raised his gleaming axe just as Jacinta came to herself and opened her eyes. Then two shrieks pierced the air. One was a cry of joy, for in the glittering steel Jacinta saw herself, so charmingly pretty—and the other a scream of anguish, as the wicked soul of the Queen took flight, unable to bear the sight of her face in the impromptu mirror.

M. Papillon had lightly doubled the cape of his fiftieth birthday, and for twelve years had been beadle in a grim old church in the upper part of Paris, not far from the fortifications. He was a tall man, an old soldier, strong as an ox, and more inoffensive than a lizard on the wall. He had a large, round figure, a comfortable double chin, closely shaven; his eyes were frank and kind. The calves of his legs, strong, egg-shaped, with the muscles well developed, exactly filled his snow-white stockings, and rounded out fully, with an air of good health, under the garters, which were tightened until they creaked. They were his sole coquetry, and he seemed as proud of them as a wrestler of his biceps.

On fête days the boys and young men of the choir, when they had taken a drop too much, amused themselves by tickling those two cushions of good flesh as they passed, and an old beadle, M. Jolitour, who remembered his youth, had said many a time, while complacently admiring those legs: "They are Parian—pure Parian."

M. Papillon, who had not the least understanding of any Grecian word, while relishing the compliment, would have been glad to know the meaning of the word "Parian," but had never dared to ask. He was a colossal model—a pearl of a beadle. He took snuff, smoking no more. Under no circumstances did he take the name of God in vain. He expressed himself always with decency and drank only to quench his thirst. He avoided the other sex. His handling of his cane was very distinguished, and his masters had left him grand traditions of the halberd. After the siege of 1870, during which M. Papillon, as everyone else, had done his duty on the ramparts, a singular, confused murmur of revolt filled the capital. Groups formed themselves on the pavements.

The policemen were questioned; they professed ignorance, but lifted their heads with a knowing air. People speechified. In the wine shops, orators aroused the working-men. Social questions were discussed in a suggestive manner. The working-men demanded finally what belonged to others. This agitation troubled M. Papillon. He heard on all sides the words, National Guard, riot, civil war, eighteenth of March. But, as he did not wish to believe anything disturbing, he said: "It is some trick of the Stock Exchange."

However, to believe became inevitable, when one morning a handful of men wearing red sashes presented themselves and demanded to see the priest; they showed a paper signed by a magistrate ordering the immediate closing of the building. They strode about the church speaking in loud voices, took the money from the alms-boxes, and withdrew without harming anyone. As soon as they had taken their departure the priest came out hastily from his concealment, removed, with the assistance of M. Papillon, the sacred vessels and the richest ornaments, then took refuge in the house of a woman who had offered to conceal him.

As for the beadle, that same evening he closed all the doors, that of the main entrance, whose folding doors had iron-work of the fourteenth century, and those of the side aisles. He locked them with a triple lock, drew a bolt a foot long, then fastened across them the safety-chain. This done, he placed the chairs in piles against the walls. When he had fulfilled those painful duties, during which night overtook him, he was assailed by terrible thoughts of the aged priest, and that the incidents of the day would be a terrible blow for his brain; the vicars would slip away to the provinces, hiding themselves with their families, and that he would remain alone, in future, all alone to guard the church.

At this thought, in the terrifying calm of the silent sanctuary, it seemed to him that an immense responsibility had fallen from the lofty arches upon his trembling shoulders, and he had a moment of weakness as he weighed the difficulties of the task and the powerlessness of the servant.

M. Papillon had always shown for "his church" an adorable personal passion. "She" belonged to him. For nothing in the world would he see her overthrown. "She" belonged to him, and to the good God. He loved the grand nave, the choir, the side aisles. He admired the baptismal font, the organ pleased him greatly, and the crypt was dear to him. But the sacristy, with its encaustic placards, its doors draped with velvet, which fell softly, its penetrating odour of ecclesiastic robes, inspired in him a peculiar tenderness. It was there, in a small, cold room, where were placed the chasubles commonly used, that he slept ordinarily, and it was his home during the time of the Commune.

The house of the Lord had the appearance of an abandoned gymnasium. It slept, torpid, in its robe of grey stone, lugubrious and desolate as those churches of the Middle Ages bending under the weight of an "Interdiction." One would scarcely have believed that in the shadow of those walls, only a few steps away, a revolution was established. Sometimes the strains of the Marseillaise sounded about the angles, sometimes the shocks from artillery caused the dust of ages slowly to fall—that is, the sawdust and small pieces of stone gathered in all the nooks of its ogives, and then all fell again into an unrelenting silence.

M. Papillon guarded the church like a faithful dog: at night his ears caught every sound; he started at the least nibble of a mouse. It seemed to him that someone was picking the locks of the doors. Horrible nightmares bathed him in perspiration, or unnecessary vigilance drew him from his bed, in bare feet, a light in his hand, and in spite of the clamorous beating of his heart, he would go the rounds of the church.

It was as dark as a cave. As he passed by, the green curtains of the confessionals floated lightly. The chandeliers, with their pendants of crystal, fell from the roof like monstrous spiders at the end of a thread, and the pulpit, suspended to a column, stood out in the shadow like a giant holy-water vessel. The spectacle unnerved M. Papillon, and he returned shivering to his bed.

By what marvel had the Commune forgotten this old church, hidden in a tangle of old streets? Why did the storm pass over it without attacking it? No one ever knew, not even M. Papillon. From day to day he tried to make himself less conspicuous, hiding himself, living in an obscurity reached only by the mole, as if all these precautions would be a safeguard for the temple and shelter it from all inquisition and sacrilege. He spoke only in a low voice, and wore slippers. He went out as little as possible, and always, by preference, at dusk, in order not to attract attention to "her."

When he returned he resorted to the ruses of a Nihilist being pursued, exhausting himself in frequent turns and roundabout ways, regarding each passer-by with anxiety. Objects also became accomplices in his pious thoughts; they were sunk in a profound torpor. The woodwork did not creak, and the organs held their powerful breath, as if they understood.

From time to time to distract himself, he climbed to the tower, and when he mounted the two hundred and fifty steps of the narrow winding stairway, near to the great, silent bells tattooed with inscriptions in Latin, he looked at Paris through a narrow opening. Paris the great criminal, covered with heavy clouds. The clamours of the delirious city rose insolently towards heaven, and to him, M. Papillon, simple beadle; violent anger took possession of him as of "Moses on Sinai," on seeing in the long avenues, in the places, in the courts of the barracks, intrigues and rioting, and the swarming of the revolutionists, who looked no larger than insects.

What good purpose will it serve to follow honest people as if they were beasts, and to declare war on the God of Armies, when one could be so happy doing one's easy little service, keeping the wood floors of the sacristy polished like a mirror, and leading the church wardens to their pews? What a misfortune! And he redescended from the bells, muttering some words remembered from an Easter sermon: "You will become a second Sodom and Gomorrah;" and it was true, he saw it.

One afternoon, when he had ventured out a little, to take the air, he had a real fright—he came upon a platoon of the National Guard, who were singing.

The officer, a large man, looked him in the eyes, and stopping him, said: "You belong to this quarter, citizen?"

"Yes," murmured M. Papillon feebly, and it seemed to him that "his" church loomed up above the roofs larger than Notre Dame, looked gigantic, causing itself to be seen for miles. But it was not "she," poor thing, they wished. The officer sought the number of a house in a neighbouring street. Although M. Papillon did not know the address, he immediately offered himself as guide, found the street, ferreted out the number, and accompanied the lieutenant, whom he called "my captain," as far as the door. This man was capable of every baseness to distract attention from "his" church.

* * * * *

However, time passed The interminable days slipped by in the most dolorous enervation. The dust heaped itself on the altars, the spiders wove their webs between the chandeliers; at the bottom of the holy-water basin some bands of copper were spotted with verdigris. He effaced them, filled with despair. One day, when he had gone out according to custom to make some small purchases, Madame Davouille, at the bakery, whispered in his ear: "It is for the day after to-morrow!"

"What is that you say?"

"From Versailles!" whispered she.

M. Papillon remained silent from the shock, not finding a word to say.

"Yes, the day after to-morrow they re-enter!" affirmed the honest woman. "If I were in your place I'd take a four-pound loaf, because I shall not open the shop after this evening."

M. Papillon, his bread under his arm, returned excitedly. It was true, then. This revolution was about to be finished; he would no longer be obliged to hide himself like a brigand. He would see again the white head of the priest, the large hands of M. Loiséau, the organist; the red skirts of the choir boys, and the silk cap of Father Branchu, the bestower of the holy water.

The lamps of the sanctuary would speedily be relighted! Thank God, there were now on the list some grand marriages and rich interments! As in the good times, there would be the catechism, again the holy eucharist would be carried to people in the last extremity, all would be happy again! And he felt tremors of delight at the thought of a church thoroughly clean, with clouds of incense floating over the kneeling faithful ones; what joy to see appear again points of gold on the tall candles.

The following morning he was awakened by the noise of cannon. There was fighting in the streets. The baker had not been mistaken. Dread and hope rent the heart of the beadle. Erect, in a corner of the chapel of St. Agnes, he listened to the sounds of artillery which rapidly approached. The loudest detonations threw him upon his knees. They were killing each other in the quarter, behind the barricades blood would flow in streams. They were slaughtering the women certainly, and the children also, for cries surged up like the wail of savage beasts when being hacked to pieces, rending the air each second. A great light illuminated the church at times, when it seemed to be embraced by the purple rays of a glorious setting sun.

M. Papillon, in his narrow and simple fashion tormented by I know not what military and religious coquetry, resolved to make himself fine to assist in the triumphal entry of those brave soldiers who were going to bring peace once more. He imagined, innocently, that the conquerors, with the clarion sounding, would bring back with them the priest, the vicars, the organist, the little Benedicamus—all the dead absentees. He opened a clothes-press, drawing from it a package of clothes enveloped in a napkin, and reverently, without haste, carefully made his toilet to the sound of the cannonading, with as much tranquility as if to the sound of the organ.

He put on the fine stockings, the kneebreeches of "crushed strawberry," with vest of the same shade, the coat trimmed à la Louis XIV., also a baldrick of embroidered velvet, from the bottom of which dangled a sword in its steel scabbard; took in one hand his cane, in the other his halberd, and wearing his plumed hat, gravely seating himself and waited, pale and expectant.

Now they were fighting behind the church. With a dry sound, like pebbles rattling on a sheet of paper, the balls perforated the windows, sometimes splintering the leaden sashes, which came down upon the stone flagging with loud clatter. Two frightened owls fluttered in the nave. M. Papillon looked and listened.

Suddenly the great door, with its ironwork of the fourteenth century, trembled from top to bottom, beaten by the butt end of guns, in the midst of a clamour of imprecations: "Open the door! In the name of God open the door!" The beadle hastened, and in a clear voice, that trembled from emotion, asked: "Who is there? Is it Versailles?" Silence followed.

The cries redoubled, became shrieks: "Yes, yes! Versailles, Versailles!" But as he proceeded to draw the bolts, under the weight of the enraged and violent assailants, with blows like that of a battering-ram, the old door gave way—the lock flew in pieces, and folding doors rattled back against the walls with such force as to break some Venetian blinds, which, thus opened, admitted the dawn. In the light from a conflagration a crowd burst into the church—women with hands blackened with powder, in the mask of the damned, took possession of the house of the Lord.

When M. Papillon saw those devils escaped from Hades invade "his church," spread themselves everywhere, enter the choir, he attempted to cry out against the sacrilege—to speak—to weep. He extended his arms, but he had not even time to move his lips—to make a single gesture. The torrent overwhelmed him, carried him as if he were a cork. In the twinkling of an eye, the doorkeeper of the good God was snatched up—his shanks in the air, his backbone broken, he was drawn along the floor by his coat, like a used-up puppet. A half-hour later, when some soldiers penetrated, with circumspection, the great, empty, silent church, which presaged nothing good, they were stupefied to see, stretched on his back across the steps of the grand altar, a huge man in kneebreeches and French dress.

About the body two owls hovered in the rays of the sun.

Henri Lavedan.

An Eye for an Eye.

A Legend of Venice.

"Come nearer, my little pet dove, and lay thy head on my breast—so. Now am I better able to defend thee from danger."

The man bent down, and impressed his passionate kisses on the dark cheek of the maiden. The gondola rippled slowly through the moonlit waters, while above, the bright Italian stars shone lovingly over the fair city of Venice.

"Ah, Marguerita, it is good to live. How happy we are together. What wouldst thou do if I were to leave thee?"

The girl stroked her lover's hand with her cool fingers.

"Speak not like that, Francesco, for thou knowest well that thou wilt never leave me, nor I thee."

"Supposing an assassin were to plunge a stiletto into my breast, what then, little dove?" For in those days such deeds were common.

The dark eyes of the maiden flashed fiercely, and her little hands clenched.

"First I should be avenged, Francesco. I would slay thy murderer even as he had slain thee. Then should I follow thee to the bright land of which thou hast told me."

The man gazed down at the girl in his arms, and knew that her words were spoken in earnest. With such lover-talk as this the hours were chased away, until the moon rose high into the bright sky. The gondola was drifting slowly down a secluded canal. On either side were tall, grim-looking houses, indicating that their owners were people of no little wealth. Presently the young man rose to his feet and steered the gondola to one of the more pretentious of these.

"Farewell, Marguerita; sleep well, and dream of me." The girl ran lightly up the steps, and, after pausing for a moment to wave her hand to her lover, disappeared within.

Humming a little tune to himself, Francesco sprang back in his boat, and with a few swift strokes, shot out into mid-water.

But what is this which moves behind the curtain What is this which slowly rears its head of wild, dishevelled hair, whose eyes shine like burning coals, whose teeth are as the fangs of a tigress, whose nails are as the claws of a she-wolf? What is this which creeps slowly forward, and then springs on the man, and buries its claws in his eyes, and its fangs in his throat, that drives a dagger three times into his heart, and then seizes him in its arms, and hurls him into the dark waters? What is this strange thing which steers the gondola back to the stage of Pietro the boatman, and then runs quickly away until it finds shelter in the darkness of night?

"It is an evil Spirit," said Pietro, and crossed himself devoutly.

For a man and a maiden had set out in his boat together, and the boat had returned with neither man nor maid, but only with a wild Thing, which said no word, but ran swiftly past him.

Soon the early morning sun shone out over the lagoons. For long years the little latticed window of Francesco's room had opened, and his rich, mellow voice had gone out to greet it. But to-day it does not open, and the singer is silent, for Francesco is lying dead beneath the waters near his lover's home.

That night the old father had dreamed strange dreams of his son. Now he is waiting for the sound of the opening window and the cheerful song.

"I will go to arouse him," he said at last, as he hurriedly slipped on his garments and left his chamber. He opened the door, and called gently: "Francesco! Francesco!" but no answer came.

"I will go to Pietro the boatman," said the old man, "for he, perhaps, has seen my son."

But Pietro, with his white face, could only answer to his questions that Francesco, the night before, had gone out with Marguerita on his arm, and that the gondola had returned with neither one nor the other, but with an Evil Spirit.

"Show me the gondola," said the old man, "we may find something that they have left behind them."

"It is this," replied Pietro, "and there is nothing—stay, what 's that in the corner yonder? Holy Virgin, it is a dagger, and see, there are the marks of blood!"

"Alas! Francesco, oh, my son Francesco, is it possible that thou art dead?" The old man's grief was pitiful to behold. Pietro, too, was sorry.

"I will go at once to Marguerita. She, perhaps, may know something."

Marguerita was standing on the steps of her house, throwing bread to the pigeons.

"Good-morning, father," she cried. "Hast thou seen Francesco? Is he well to-day?"

"Alas, my daughter, I know not whether he be dead or alive. The gondola returned without him, and Pietro says there was only an Evil Spirit. There were marks of blood in the boat, and see, we found this dagger. Surely my son is dead."

"Let me see the dagger," said Marguerita. She looked at it for a moment, and then she said: "I do not know it." But in her heart she knew that it was the dagger of Laurella, her rival.

All that morning Marguerita shut herself in her closet, and mourned for her lover, and planned to avenge his death, as she had promised to do. She knew well that it was Laurella who had done the cruel deed; for she had loved her lover with a mad love, as she had hated her with a mad hatred. Often had she sworn to slay the one or the other, to avenge the love which had been denied her, and the oath of an Italian maid is not lightly to be despised.

It was all made clear to her now. Laurella had cunningly hidden herself in the gondola, trusting that the lovers would sit together and drift quietly down with the current. Then, when she herself had sought her home, she had sprang out, and murdered Francesco.

"She has slain him," cried Marguerita, "and even as she has killed him, with her own dagger, so will I kill her."

Thus she remained in her room, weeping, and musing on her vengeance.

Laurella, too, with the mark of a murderess upon her, kept her closet that morning. Then, lest appearances should be against her, she strolled out through the many little lanes and by-ways of Venice. At this moment a boy brushed past her, and placing a missive in her hand, ran hurriedly on. With trembling fingers she opened the paper and read these words:

"Thy life is in danger. One who has something to give thee seeks opportunity to speak with thee. Be, without fail, in the old courtyard of the ruined Palazzo, near thy home, at two in the morning."

Laurella returned hastily to her room to solve the riddle. She waited until the sun had sank to his rest, but heeded not the glories that he shed over the City of Waters. She waited until the stars came out in the sky, and then her mind was determined. She put on only a long, dark cloak, that hid her form from head to foot, and placing a dagger carefully in the folds, she set cautiously out to the ruined Palazzo. The place, now old and deserted, at one time was the palace of princes. The four walls of the courtyard almost surrounded it on every side, while in one corner the grand stairway led up to the entrance.

Laurella, keeping cautiously in the shadow of the moon, hid herself behind a pillar, and waited, trembling. As her eyes became accustomed to the dim light, she discerned a figure moving among the pillars opposite. It was robed, as she was, in one long garment, but this was white, and glistened strangely. Suddenly the figure stepped out into a patch of moonlight, and Marguerita's clear tones came across the square.

"Laurella, I have something to give thee!"

She started at the words, but answered boldly:

"Ah, it is Marguerita, the stealer of hearts. I, too, have something for thee."

Hastily throwing off her robe, and grasping her stiletto firmly in her hand, with a laugh on her lips, she stepped forward.

Marguerita also placed her cloak on the ground, and came slowly forward, with one accusing arm pointed towards her rival, while the other, the arm of the avenger with a dagger in the hand, was held aloft.

Thus the strange duel began, woman's arm against woman's arm, woman's love against woman's hatred.

Slowly, step by step, they advanced towards the centre of the square. Then, with a sudden spring, they rushed onward, and the sound of clashing steel rang out sharply.

They recoiled, and closed again in fierce embrace. Laurella's breath came hot and quick, in short gasps. Marguerita's face was white and stern and set, as she warded the blows with her dagger, and awaited the opportunity to stab.

Fast and hard came the strokes from Laurella's weapon. The lust for blood flowed through her veins, and suddenly, gathering all her strength together, she sprang wildly forward. Marguerita stepped aside, and her own steel entered the uplifted arm. With a cry of pain Laurella dashed her weapon to the stones, and, turning, fled away. She sped swiftly round the square, with arm uplifted, and her long hair streaming out behind, but fast as she ran Marguerita ran faster behind her, until she felt the hot breath upon her neck. Then with a wild cry she darted towards the grand staircase.

At that moment her naked foot trod on the dagger lying on the ground. She stumbled heavily forward, her head crashed against the foot of the stairs, and she lay, with her face towards the stars, white and rigid on the cold pavement.

Marguerita stopped and gazed for a moment on the beautiful form of her enemy. Then she knelt down and sought with her dagger's point for her rival's heart. She placed both hands on the hilt and pressed upon it with all her strength. Then she rose to her feet, and leaving Laurella lying cold and stark beneath the pitiless rays of the moon, she threw on her white robe, and quietly left the courtyard.

CHAPTER LV.

True Without Ties.

"Confound it, I wish I had half his heart," groaned Braetoun, as he went straight to the bar, ordered brandy, drank it at a gulp, and then went up to his room, where he threw himself on a couch; but he had hardly sunk back before the door was thrown open, and a little fellow, whip in hand, in long overcoat which just showed his boots, ran in, threw off his bowler hat, displaying a handsome, boyish face with closely cut hair, and dragging open the long coat, took an amber and black jockey cap from the breast pocket and drew it on, at the same time revealing the amber satin shirt—the Braetoun colours—above his breeches and boots.

"What the devil!" exclaimed Braetoun, springing up excitedly. "Why, boy, will you dare to mount her?"

"Yes, Rod, and win."

"Lucy!" he shouted, falling back on the couch with open mouth.

For a moment the pretty, fair face was convulsed, and the Cupid boy-like lips quivered; then the features were hard and firm, and, with eyes flashing, she buttoned up the coat, and gave her boot a cut with the whip.

"Quick!" she cried harshly. "There isn't a minute to spare. I heard the plot yesterday—went home with Auntie. She had these—you remember the chorus in the little opera—I made her do the dresses in your colours. I have only just come."

"But—oh, madness! You can't ride her."

"I can, and I will."

"No, no, it's folly, girl."

"It's to save my own, dear, old boy," she cried, with her face twitching again, but only for a moment.

"But you can't ride her, Baby."

"Then who can?"

"The trick—the jockey's dodging."

"Put me on Bella Donna, and I'll be first at the post, or die."

"No; bad as I am, girl, I can't let you do that."

"Rod, you shall now; quick, or I'll go alone. It's your last chance, and——"

"Come on!" he cried; and, wild with excitement, he rushed with her out on to the landing, followed her down the broad stairs to where a fly was waiting, and in two minutes they were at the deserted stable, where Braetoun's hands trembled so that he could hardly unlock the door.

"We shall be too late—too late," he groaned.

"They're never to time," she said. "Ah, my own old pet," she cried, as she ran to the stall, where the mare stood facing them, reined to the rings on the pillars, and a whinnying welcome met her as she began to unbuckle one strap. "Now, Rod, risk it. Clap on the saddle. I'll manage the bridle."

"Too late—too late," he groaned; "we can never do it."

"The saddle," she cried, her own hands busy with the bridle, which hung all ready, and by the time Braetoun had unbuckled the roller, and slipped the cloth from the beautiful satin skin, Lucy was ready to help him by taking the saddle from the wooden horse, and placing it in his hands.

Braetoun, strung up by the brandy and excitement, worked as he had never worked before, the saddle was clapped on, with the mare not so much as wincing, only keeping up the soft whinnying noise, and turning her velvet muzzle to play with the girl's little white hand.

"We shall never do it, it's the time now."

"We will do it," cried Lucy, as the last girth was buckled. "They're always late, and I'm going to win now. Quick, a leg up—no, one moment," and she threw off her coat, stepped before the mare, and, whip in hand, took hold of the bit, raised the muzzle, and looked in the beautiful great gazelle-like eyes of the fierce beast.

"Bella Donna—beautiful lady," she cried, with the tears in her eyes, "for your poor little mistress's sake, make me win."

She kissed the mare's forehead, and the next moment put her dainty foot in Braetoun's hands, to be lightly thrown into the saddle.

"Now," she cried, "for the sake of our good old times."

"For the sake of the old times," he groaned; and taking the rein, he led out the mare and ran by her side towards the saddling paddock.

As they approached the hotel, a little crowd of people was passing out to make for the course close at hand—for, consequent upon the usual want of punctuality, there was ample time—and just as one of the party was loudly cursing his luck, and swearing Braetoun had sold the race, another caught sight of the graceful mare approaching, with the peculiar colours of her jockey.

He threw his hat in the air with a wild yell of delight.

"Bella Donna!" he roared, and there was a shout, which was taken up by voice after voice, running right into the saddling paddock, so that as Braetoun, with his face scarlet, ran up with the mare, they were greeted with a tremendous burst of cheering, and a heavy-looking man and a boy, the former showing a broad weal across his face, elbowed their way to the front and tried to get to the mare.

"Mind, Rod, look out!" whispered Lucy.

The warning was not needed, for, as Braetoun caught sight of the pair he shouted:

"Fair play! Keep those two hounds back. They tried to sell the race."

A fierce yell of execration burst out, and the crowd closed round Vinnis and his son, who were hustled out of the paddock in spite of their frantic appeals and the father's declaration that Braetoun was to blame.

Those in charge of the other horses looked on aghast, and then took comfort as they stared at the jockey on Bella Donna's back.

"Pitch him into the middle of next week before we start," said one of the other jockeys with a grin; and then he stared to see how patient the mare was while the preliminaries were gone through, and Lucy carried herself as if to the manner born.

"Why, where did you pick up that boy, Braetoun?" cried one.

"Keep back, please," he said sternly. "You know what the mare is. She may lash out."

"I tell you what it is," said one old race-goer; "you ought to be ashamed of yourself to put the poor lad upon such a she-devil. The boy will never come back alive."

The behaviour of the mare seemed to endorse his words, for, growing excited now by the people about, she began to fidget, laying down her ears, rolling her eyes and showing the whites, while her teeth were bared, ready to lay hold of anyone near.

But each time she seemed at her worst Lucy bent right forward over her neck, and patted and talked to her in her sweet, low, cooing voice, with the result that the mare whinnied and calmed down.

"Bravo, my lad!" cried the gentleman who had cheered as he came out of the hotel. "You'll win. There, my lad, you come to me afterwards, and I'll give you a hundred pounds."

Lucy nodded and smiled, and Braetoun led the mare away toward the course.

"Sits her as if he had grown there," cried the last speaker. "Hang the boy! he's good-looking enough for a girl."

For a moment or two Braetoun felt that it must all be a dream, and that in this dream, with its wondrous mingling of impossibilities, Cyrus Daines had found and conjured Lucy into the good genius who was to save him from utter abject ruin.

But no, it was real enough, and he was leading the mare, which ambled along gently with her rider sitting easily and as it were upon the softest springs. The cheers too, which kept on greeting them were real enough, and at last the misty sensation of unreality settled down into the stern matter-of-fact.

And now, with his heart beating in low, heavy throbs, a feeling of icy horror began to creep through his veins, chilling him, and freezing up the power of thinking of anything but a few stern facts, the essence of which settled down into the bitter question:

Had he not done this poor, true-hearted little creature sufficient injury without sending her to a horrible death? for he felt now that he was going to let her attempt the impossible, and that it could only have one end.

They were in the course now, and he was walking so near that he had but to raise his head and look up sidewise to meet her eyes. But he dared not do that; he could only walk on, with the afternoon sun pouring down hot and bright, and casting their shadows as they went on with the crowd on either side of the course cheering madly at the sight of the favourite, which they had been told would not run. And whenever there was a lull, Bella Donna's backers started the cheering again, while handkerchiefs and race cards were fluttering in the grand stand, and hundreds of glasses were following every pace.

"I can't do it—I can't do it," groaned Braetoun. "It's madness. Poor little lass; she shan't die like that."

He checked the mare, and she began to resent it, shaking her head and making so fierce a plunge that she jerked the rein out of his hand, but Lucy sat firmly in her saddle, yielding to the mare's bound, which brought her a little in front of Braetoun, and in an instant his hand was on her arm.

"No, no," he whispered hoarsely, "curse the money, the mare, the whole world. I've been a brute to you, Baby, but I can't save myself in such a way as this. Come back; you shall not ride."

She bent down a little till her lips were close to his ear.

"God bless you for that," she whispered; "then you do care for me a little still. Rod, dear, I'm going to win."

He raised his hand to seize the rein, but at the slight pressure of her rider's heels, the mare made a tremendous bound forward, and away she went, to follow the example of the others taking their preliminary canter, gliding over the yielding turf like a swallow, and apparently with as little effort.

"Ah!" groaned Braetoun. "Once more too late."

"Why, Braetoun, old fellow," said a member of his club, "you look as if you'd seen a ghost. Hold up. You'll win now. We've been cursing you up hill and down dale for selling us. Wherever did you pick up that little jock?"

"Had an interview with Mephistopheles," said another, smiling, "sold himself, body and soul, so that he might win this race."

"Right! Quite right," cried Braetoun, with a laugh which sent a chill through his companions. "That's what I have done, and I'm going to win."

"You are, thank goodness," cried the first speaker. "By George, look at that! Well done, little one. Look at the handsome little imp. He rides her like a fairy."

For Bella Donna swept by with her hoofs hardly seeming to touch the ground, and Braetoun hurried on to try and get a word with Lucy before the start.

"Racing's exciting," said one of Braetoun's friends to the other; "but hang me if it doesn't seem something far above that to old Roddy. He looks as if he were going to have a fit."

But before Braetoun had gone many steps he heard his name pronounced, and caught sight of Daines standing on the step of a carriage, gesticulating wildly to him.

He slipped aside, for he was in a state of exaltation in which he was swayed by any impulse.

"Then it's all right; you found him?" cried Daines.

"Yes," said Braetoun, looking at him strangely; "it's all right—I've found him."

There was no time for more. He had to find a place by the winning post, the desire being gone which would have taken him after the horses to the starting point, and a peculiar sensation of weakness, the reaction after the wild excitement of the last hour or so, paralysed his limbs.

Ghastly white now, he stood holding on by a rail, listening to the roar of voices and the wild booming of a bell; and once more feeling as if in a dream, he stood waiting for what seemed to be an hour, while someone high above him, armed with a pair of race-glasses, spoke aloud in a clear, distinct voice, for the benefit of a man with a note-book and pencil.

"Getting them all together. Eight," said the man. "Good line. Bella Donna breaks away. Gone right off backward. Coming back. Another off—forward this time. Lord Granger's filly. Got them together again. Splendid line. Flag falls. No, no, false start. Bella Donna again. Hundred yards. Made them all restive. Blue with red stripe rearing and nearly losing her rider. See card. All right. Mr. Davenport's mare. Good line again. No; all in disorder. Won't start them off. Ah, quickly and cleverly done. Flag down as soon as amber gets in place. They're off."

A dull, low murmur of excitement drowned the greater part of what was said afterwards, that peculiar breathing of a vast crowd at the full pitch of excitement; but as he clutched that rail, the words which related to his mare came with metallic clearness to Braetoun's ears and he heard that she was for some time running nearly last, and he felt that it was all over, that Lucy in her utter ignorance of racing could not by any possibility win. But it did not matter, so long as she came in safe that would be sufficient. He wanted no more. Only let her come in safe.

He could not pray, or in those brief moments, with every nerve strained to maddening, breaking point, he would have breathed an appeal for the poor girl's safety.

It was all in those maddening minutes, and he closed his eyes as the man above him, seeing what would have been hidden from him by his position had he striven to follow the race, went on dictating his brief notes.

"Tittup, Davenport's filly. Fair Amy making the running; rest nowhere; with Bella Donna as whipper-in. Unchanged. Coming round the corner. Fair Amy falls back; Tittup and the filly have it all their own way. Bella Donna drawing even with last horse. Boy can't manage her. Losing her chance for third. The filly drawing a head; Tittup nearly sick. No. Cleverly ridden. She closes up again, and favorite nearly clear of the ruck behind. Good promise for third. On the straight. Good race. Bella Donna's jockey settling down for the run home, coming on hand over hand. Good third. Tittup first. Bella Donna challenging the filly for second place. Good race level; clear by a head; challenges Tittup."

What more he said was drowned in the wild roar of excitement, and Braetoun strained forward, wild-eyed and staring now, to watch the finish of one of the most exciting races of the season, as, still so far behind that all chance of success seemed impossible, Bello Donna's rider could be seen almost motionless as she stood in her stirrups, while the mare literally skimmed over the turf as if madly desirous of passing the filly, whose jockey, after a glance behind, was urging her on with whip and spur, working his reins and doing everything he knew to reach the post first.

The race seemed certain, and the exciting roar was for Bella Donna as she strove her best, a full length behind, when close home; but a few bounds and she was drawing up—half a length, a neck, a head, behind; and then, as if warming more and more to the task in hand, she literally shot past her adversary, faster, faster, faster, and in the midst of the wild excitement, Braetoun, with starting eyes, had a glimpse of the amber satin, as the mare swept close by him like a flash, and Tittup thundered by, more than a length behind.

CHAPTER LVI.

With her Heart's Blood.

Lucy's struggle seemed to be yet to come, for the mare swept in full career; but a minute later she had obeyed the steady pull upon her bit, and turned, to come gently back, Braetoun, trembling like a leaf, hurrying to meet her, take the reins, and, surrounded by an excited crowd, lead her to the scales.

But before they reached the weighing place there was a rush made by a wizen-faced jockey in long coat, evidently with some sinister intent. Whatever it was, though, was checked by one of the mounted police who formed the winner's escort. The constable reached down from his horse, caught the lad by the collar, and turned him back while the rider passed into safety.

"Have—have I really won?" panted the girl, as she bent down to speak to Braetoun.

"Won? Yes," he whispered back. "Oh, my own brave, true heart! But," he cried excitedly, "you're bleeding! What is it? Did she throw up her head and strike your face?"

"Oh, no: nothing, nothing," she said, with a little laugh, as she sprang lightly from the saddle, threw it over her arm as soon as it was free, took her seat in the scales, was judged all right, and then as she sprang up she caught at Braetoun's arm with a peculiar pallor gathering in her face.

"Quick! to the hotel!" she whispered; "take me away from here. Auntie!"

Friends were gathering round; men were cheering the successful jockey, and scores were eager to shake hands; but horror-stricken now, Braetoun shouted to the people to stand back, and hurried his companion to where he could find a cab, into which he helped her, sprang on to the footboard, and shouted to the driver to take them to the hotel.

It was quickly done, but an excited crowd was in full pursuit, and they had hard work to reach the place first.

The news was there before them, and a burst of cheers from the people in front of the house greeted them, as Braetoun sprang out, and Lucy followed lightly, but only to sink into his arms, fainting, with the blood trickling in a scarlet thread from her lips.

"Here! a chair," cried Braetoun. "Now carry—" he nearly said to his own room. "Send up some champagne."

There was no difficulty in finding the right room, for Aunt Duncan, with her red face mottled with white, stood at the head of the stairs, and seizing Lucy's hand wildly as soon as it was within reach, guided them into her apartment, where the insensible little figure, with the gay satin shirt now stained with blood, was carefully laid upon a couch, but only to open her eyes, staring wildly and fighting for breath till she was once more in an erect position.

"What have you done—what have you done?" cried Aunt Duncan wildly.

"The mare must have thrown up her head—lips or tongue cut. Quick, a glass of water! Ah!" cried Braetoun wildly, as the awful truth struck home like a flash. "Here one of you there—the nearest doctor!—run!"

The man who had helped to carry the chair ran off, nearly striking against a slight-looking figure which had just reached the door.

It was being closed in his face, but he forced his way in.

"Rod, I congratulate——Lucy! Oh, my God!"

Daines rushed to the couch, to fall upon his knees and catch one of the little hands in his. Then snatching his handkerchief from his breast, he tenderly wiped the tiny trickling stream from the quivering lips before him.

"A doctor! quick, a doctor!" he panted. "Oh, send again. He is so long."

"Never mind," said Lucy, with a piteous little laugh, as he held the handkerchief again and again to her lips. "It doesn't matter. I've won—I've won.—Take care of her, Rod, for my sake.—They got before me so. They wouldn't let me pass—but—but—I did it at last."

"Here, drink this," said Bractoun, snatching a champagne glass from a waiter who had brought it to the door, but she shook her head.

"No, not now," she said in a strange, choking voice; and she turned to Daines and smiled, as he half supported her. "Thank you—so good to me—always, but this is best."

She turned from him and gazed at Braetoun—one long earnest look, and then struggling wildly she threw herself round to get her right arm round the neck of the sobbing woman kneeling by her on the other side of the couch. There was another effort to raise her lips for a farewell kiss but the exertion hastened the end. One hoarse choking cry accompanied by a horrible gush of blood, and Braetoun stood staring down at her as if turned to stone.

Just then the door was opened, and the doctor summoned entered the room, made his way quickly to the couch, and was about to tear open the gaudy amber shirt, but with a wild cry Daines forced him back.

"No, no," he cried; "don't touch her now. She is dead—she is dead."

The doctor bowed his head as he gazed curiously down at the light, graceful figure with its small waist and swelling hips, before saying softly:

"Yes, I can do nothing here. Evidently the rupture of an aneurism. No human skill could have saved her life."

As the words left his lips there was a deafening cheer from the front of the house. As it ceased a stentorian voice roared, with the words coming plainly through the open window:

"Bella Donna's rider—bring him out!"

Another burst of cheers followed, and a discordant band brayed out the first few bars of "See, the Conquering Hero Comes."

Daines had gone quickly to the open window, and softly drew down the blind, just as the landlord of the hotel was hurriedly explaining what had befallen the conquering hero, and the last notes died away in the awful silence which fell, while as soon as the blind touched the window-sill, Daines standing there with his back to the rest, slowly raised the blood-stained handkerchief he held to his lips, and hid it carefully in his breast.

* * * * *

It was in an over-crowded first-class carriage that evening, on the way to London, and the speaker, a blatant, over-dressed personage of the horsey type. There had been a good deal of canvassing of the day's event, and the individual in question had listened with undisguised contempt.

"Don't tell me," he said—"a gal? No gal could have ridden and won that race. But I tell you what is a fact. Lord Bractoun wins to the tune of thirty thou., so he ought to do something for the boy's mother, who was down to see him ride."

"Then you are sure it was a boy?" said another occupant of the carriage.

"Swear it," was the reply, and a thin white hand was laid slowly on the arm of a gentleman at the side, but the latter made no sign; he only turned his head to gaze into the darkness of the night, as if to see the hedges and trees seeming to fly by as the express train tore along.

But Roderick Bractoun saw neither tree nor hedge, only that little lithe figure bending over Bella Donna's neck, her large eyes gazing straight ahead as if into futurity, as she swept by him like a meteor across his path of life—saw only passionate, loving, true-hearted Lucy Lee, winning the race of her misdirected little life—in death.

"My God!" he groaned to himself; "and for such a wretch as I."

CHAPTER LVII.

The Gamester's Settling Day.

Six months had passed away, during which Murray had seen nothing of the Bractouns; but much of the time had been taken up in his own struggle back to health. Then one morning Emsworth called at Wimpole Street during a visit to London. For as soon as the old man had somewhat recovered from the stroke which prostrated him he had taken Murray's advice, jumping at it, so to speak, to get Olive beyond her husband's reach, and gone on the Continent.

"Not that it was necessary," said Emsworth on this occasion. "It has been the best trait I have seen in his character; he has never attempted to follow her, though if he had I'd have set every law at defiance, and carried her off from place to place. By my will they should never have come together again. It's all very well to talk about forgiveness, Murray, but you must give up after the seventy times seven."

"But about your health?" said Murray hastily.

"Oh, I'm all right—for an old man. But as I was saying, he has never attempted to follow her, and after all, wild scamp as he was over money matters, he has never touched her income since."

Murray turned half away, and the old man went on chatting, doubtless to the great annoyance of waiting patients.

"The old lady isn't so particular, though," said Emsworth, with a chuckle. "She sends me very pitiful begging letters from time to time, unknown to Bractoun, I'll swear. She says he is quite penniless, and that she finds it hard work to keep up appearances, and to pay her expenses and the doctors at the watering places where she takes her son for his health. But they don't hurt," said the old man, with a queer look. "I'll send her anything she likes, if she'll only keep him away. Seen him lately?"

"I? No," said Murray sharply.

"He's in a bad state, I suppose, poor fellow. He's doing penance for his past, and no mistake. Well, I'm delighted to see you again. I was obliged to come to town on business, but I go back to Florence directly. Now, let you and me have a quiet dinner somewhere together. No? Well, if I must excuse you, I must. But you don't look well, Murray. Why don't the physician heal himself? Shoemaker's wife, eh? Why a month in Italy would do you good. I'd ask you to come and join us, and I've proposed it twice to Olive, but it quite upset her, and she begged me not to ask you. She won't see anyone, or go anywhere; keeps to a secluded life with me, and, 'pon my soul, Murray, I'm only too glad. Selfish, of course, but it's perfect bliss to me to have the poor darling with me once more. She frets, of course, but I don't believe she would ever go to him again. There, I'm taking up your time. Good-bye, my dear boy. I hope some day to settle down in town again, and that time will have softened my poor girl's trouble. Then we shall be able to see more of you, as in the pleasant old days."

Murray saw Emsworth twice in the succeeding eighteen months, and from what the old man told him, their life abroad was quite unchanged, Olive shrinking always when he suggested a return to town.

It was six months since he had heard anything of them or of Bractoun. He saw Daines from time to time, but Bractoun's name was never mentioned. Then one morning he was startled from his ordinary course of life, unmoved as he was in his constant struggle to give health to the hundreds who flocked to the popular physician, for Rancer brought in a message that had been delivered by a commissionaire.

Digitized by Google

Murray opened the envelope, and turned a little paler than usual, as he found a visiting card within—Braetoun's—and scribbled upon it in pencil, over the address in Montague Street:

"Come and see me for the last time—dying."

The card dropped from Murray's hand, and he sat with his hands resting upon the table, gazing down at vacancy.

"Any answer, sir?" said Rancer at last.

"Eh?" cried Murray, starting. "Yes, say I will come on at once."

At once was none too soon, for the face which confronted him upon being taken to the invalid's room by Lady Braetoun, who still looked artfully young, told its own tale.

"He has been wanting to see you so very much for a year past, Dr. Murray," she said; "but he would not send till this morning. Now do—do prescribe for him as you used to. No one ever did him so much good as you, and I've spent quite a fortune upon him, going from doctor to doctor during the past few months."

"Yes, mother," said Braetoun, with a tinge of sarcasm in his words, "I have been a bad expense to you. Now please go, and Allan Murray will soon set me straight."

"Ah, that's right. He always was so clever, ever since you were boys together at Eton, and you used to bring him home. There, I'll leave you and come back soon. Why, he looks brighter already with your coming."

"Eton? Yes, old Eton," sighed Braetoun; "and it only seems like yesterday. But I'm glad you've come, Allan, old man."

Murray looked at him sternly, with the last meeting forming a background to the wasted face before him.

"She doesn't know—poor dear old butterfly. Loves me her way."

"Do you wish me to try and treat your case?" said Murray slowly.

Braetoun laughed.

"The creaking door that has hung so long on its rusty hinges—to oil them again? You know," said Braetoun, with a smile. "I've fought it off for the last two years, for I wanted to live a bit longer, and you know, too, how careful I must have been. I have, since little Lucy died."

He was silent for a few moments, and then went on slowly:

"I put it off to the last, and then I sent. I wanted to say something, before I ask you to put aside the past ten years, and shake hands as if we were boys once more.—Allan, old man, I know."

He paused again, and passed his thin white hand over his prematurely wrinkled forehead.

"Life's a long mistake to some of us who have no ballast—eh? There, this is beating about the bush. I'll say what I wanted to say—it was only this, solemnly, before I lie back for the long sleep."

He groaned again, and then with his eyes fixed steadfastly upon his old schoolfellow:

"Murray, I sent for you to hear my last words—the words of a man who for the past two years has suffered Heaven only knows what agony of mind and body—and now this is what, with clear vision of the past, I believe—that you were always to me a true and faithful friend, and that my wife, Olive, was as pure a woman as ever breathed. Will you grip my hand again—once before I go?"

Murray's hand grasped that which was feebly raised; catching it before it fell back upon the couch, and Braetoun smiled, and for a few moments he looked once more to his old companion the bright, handsome, reckless lad of the Eton days.

"At last!"

Five minutes later Lady Braetoun softly opened the door.

"Now you two have certainly had quite long enough to——"

"Hush!" said Murray softly, as he laid down the hand from which the last pulsation had fled. "Lady Braetoun he is at rest."

CHAPTER LVIII.

At Last.

Two years later, Isaac Emsworth was back in Eaton Place, and not alone.

It was a bright summer evening, and Murray had been dining there. He had attended the old man several times since his return.

"Not that there's much the matter, my dear boy," he said, "but seventy isn't forty, you know, and when I'm a little extra wrong, if it's only a chat with you, you don't know how much better it makes me feel."

But upon this particular occasion the conversation had turned upon another topic than Emsworth's health, and in conclusion the old man had said, with no little emotion:

"Heaven knows, my boy, nothing would make my journey to the end easier, and set me more at rest. It has been my dream ever since she has been free, but I made such a mess of it before that I said I would never make a sign, and you know I never did. And I won't stir now—but in Heaven's name, ask her, and see what she will say."

Murray rose from the table where they had been sitting over the untouched wine, and went slowly up to the drawing-room, where Olive was seated thoughtfully alone.

She started from her seat, trembling, as she saw him enter, and in the dim, soft light of the summer evening their eyes met—his, in one long, questioning look—hers, as they dimmed and grew suffused, as they had never looked before in his; and when he raised his hand toward her, the silent answer came, hers fell softly within the strong, firm grip.

"Ah!" ejaculated Isaac Emsworth, when an hour later they went to where he sat, utterly tired out—"at last."

THE END.

No. 416.] For the Week ending December 19th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

A NEAT SWINDLE.

"MADAME vill pardon, but ze manager zay dis note ees bad, vot you call 'flash.'"

"Bad! Nonsense, I've just received it from the bank. Let me see it."

A dainty, nervous little hand snatches the note from the greasy Italian fingers. It is spread out on the table amidst the crumbs, and twisted and turned in every conceivable way.

A tear drops upon it.

"How much is my bill?"

"Four shilling an' tree pence."

"I have no other money than this note. My name is May Armitage, I live at 31, Thurston Gardens. I will send you the money."

The waiter's shoulders shrug meaningly.

"Oh, I see you want me to leave one of my rings. Very well."

Forthwith, an unoffending finger receives sundry violent tugs, and is only saved from laceration by the opportune arrival of a friend.

"Is anything the matter, Miss Armitage?"

"Oh, Mr. Hamilton, I am so glad to see you. The waiter here says this note is bad, and it is all the money I have. I was just going to leave one of my rings."

"Dear me, what a horrid predicament to be in. May I see the note? Hum! Yes, it is a bad one sure enough. We will see to this anon. Waiter, how much is this lady's bill?"

"Four an' tree pence, sare."

"Here's half-a-sovereign—never mind the change."

"Will you let me prescribe a glass of wine, Miss Armitage? You want it, I'm sure."

"No thanks. If you will see me to a cab my spirits will soon revive in the open air; but I was awfully frightened. I made sure they would take me to prison."

"Hardly"—smiling. "But tell me. Where did you get this note—do you remember?"

"Yes. I cashed a cheque at Coutts' a few minutes before I came in here."

"Strange. Well, come along, I will see you into a cab, and then go and interview the bank people."

"You are very, very good, Mr. Hamilton. Really, I don't know what I should have done if——."

"If I hadn't turned up at the critical moment like the hero in a novel."

Two men sitting at an adjoining table had been intently watching this little drama, but not until the waiter had re-arranged the table did a single word pass between them.

"Very neat, wasn't it?"

"Yes. I suppose it was. She was a handsome girl."

"Good generalship having your retreat covered."

"What retreat?"

"Why, it was clear as daylight. The man held back, in case the game got spotted. Friend of the lady—bah!"

"The girl is perfectly innocent. The waiter changed the note."

"Did you see him do it?"

"No."

"Then how do you know he did it?"

"The note the lady gave him was folded. The one he brought back was only crumpled a bit."

"You're a smart chap, Harris, but why didn't you arrest him?"

"I preferred waiting for developments. There's more behind this than we know. I don't think it was entirely an accident that gentleman's coming on the scene at the right moment. You go to Coutts' and get the number of the note. Then keep an eye on the waiter—shadow him home."

At ten o'clock that same night Detective-Inspector Harris was informed that the bird had flown—in other words that the waiter had vanished during the officer's visit to the bank.

"Never mind, Smith—we ought to have arrested him there and then, but I thought it was something more than a mere sleight-of-hand trick."

Detective-Inspector Harris was something of a philosopher.

* * * * *

The Armitages, father and daughter, were discussing supper and spurious bank-notes. Although not a business man, Mr. Armitage knew his way about, and nothing could dissuade his mind from the certainty that the waiter had changed the note. His daughter was just as positive the note the waiter returned was the original one, but paterfamilias knew better; and quite a heated argument followed. Neither would give way a jot, and Papa Armitage allowed such oddities of expression as "pish," "bosh," etc., to occasionally escape, and no doubt, he being of an excitable nature, these would have soon given way to stronger terms had not a servant entered the room with a letter.

"What's this?" testily.

"A man brought it and he's waiting for an answer."

Mr. Armitage tore open the envelope and read the note.

"Great Cæsar! May, this is shocking."

"Whatever is it, father?"

"Why, Hamilton has been caught somehow with that bad note, and is in trouble about it."

"Where is he? Oh, how dreadful this all is. I wish I hadn't gone to that place." Then to the servant: "Who is it?"

"I don't know."

"Send the man in here, and get my boots, and order a cab," said Mr. Armitage.

The messenger was ushered in. He was a typical representative of the criminal class, and had that hunted, cunning look, the stamp of his genius.

"Where is this gentleman?"

"I'll take you to him, but I carn't give the show away."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, if I tells you where 'e are"—jerking a thumb over his shoulders—"you'd blow the gaff. No, I'll take you there all on the square, mister."

"I had better go, my dear."

"Oh, father, I am so frightened. Do take a policeman with you."

"Wouldn't do, miss. Yer pa and the gen'l'man al' be 'ome in 'arf-an-hour, miss, an' no 'arm shall come to them. Just you leave that to me, miss."

The cab was dismissed at Tottenham Court Road corner, and Mr. Armitage was then led by this mysterious guide through side-streets and alleys, along dark passages—in short, Mr. Armitage knew he was being taken a roundabout way as a blind. It was a waste of strategy, for once off the main thoroughfare Mr. Armitage was lost as to his whereabouts.

This procession of two finally stopped. After some preconcerted signals had been exchanged between Mr. Armitage's escort and those within the grimy-looking house, Mr. Armitage was invited to enter. The room into which he was ushered was in marked contrast to the exterior of the building, for though it was large, and one end furnished with gambling materials, the other had some claim to be termed luxurious.

Hamilton was seated in one corner, and rose as Mr. Armitage entered.

"My dear Hamilton, I am sorry about this; I feel that it is partly my——"

"My hands are tied, Mr. Armitage."

"What do you mean?"

Addressing a yellow-skinned, frock-coated individual, who stood close to Hamilton.

"The gent. turned rusty a bit, and we had to clap on the curb—ha, ha!"

"How did this happen, Hamilton?"

"I'm ashamed of myself, sir, but will tell you all. I met one or two old friends this evening and I drank more wine than usual. When I left them I met this man—whom I had never seen before—we had drinks and finally I came in here and played baccarat. I lost, and what with the excitement of the game and the wine, I forgot all about that bad note, and—well, discovered that I was among a lot of sharps."

"Steady, sir, I think our money will bear a better scrutiny than yours."

"Well, I suppose you want the money made good. How much is it?"

"One hundred pounds—cash."

"One hundred pounds? Have you lost all that, Hamilton?"

"Allow me to explain, my dear sir; but won't you take a seat?"

"No, I won't."

"As you please, of course. Now the case stands thus: this gentleman has lost about forty or fifty pounds only, but after what has happened it is quite certain that my establishment——"

"Gambling hell."

The cynical coolness of this man was slowly but surely rousing the ire of Mr. Armitage.

"As you are going to pay the piper, my dear sir, you shall select the—eh, music—I will therefore call it a gambling hell, as you like the sound better, and it, as I was saying, will have to close—or to be more correct, not open again, but I must live. Ah, yes, I know what you want to say, my dear sir, and what if I do live by my wits? I don't try and pass spurious bank-notes, but try to work on the square—so I must have a hundred or hand this nobleman over to the police."

Then sitting down, the gentleman calmly rolled a cigarette, lit it, and seemed on good terms with himself.

"Can he do this, Hamilton?"

"I'm afraid he can, sir, so, as they won't accept my cheque, would you mind drawing one out for the amount, and I will give you mine for it?"

Digitized by Google

"Certainly, my boy—hi, fellow, bring some ink and a pen."

"You dear, innocent old gentleman, do you think I am such a fool as to accept a cheque? Not if you made it out for ten thousand. I must have hard cash, or good—mind good—notes."

"And—do—you think I go about with a hundred pounds in my pockets?"

"Perhaps not. You could raise it among your friends, though."

"Why, bless me, it is after midnight—the thing is impossible."

"It is late, I'll admit. See here, you seem a decent old bird, will you give me your word as a gentleman that your cheque will be duly honoured?"

"I will."

"Then I don't mind obliging you, but mind, any hanky panky will mean skilly for this, eh?—nobleman, I think I called you, sir!"

Half-an-hour after handing over the cheque, Mr. Armitage and Hamilton were comfortably settled in the dining-room at 31, Thurston Gardens. Miss Armitage, satisfied that her father had safely returned, and had got the prisoner duly bailed, discreetly retired.

The two men talked for some time, and then lapsed into silence—a silence that became irksome to both, yet neither cared to carry on the desultory conversation that talking meant. Finally Hamilton rose to go.

"And now, Mr. Armitage, before I go, let me get out of your debt as far as money is concerned. I can pay you back your loan, but your kindness will always be a debt."

Hamilton produced a cheque-book, and looked round the room for some ink.

"Just put that away, my boy. I don't know, and don't want to pry into your private affairs, but I dare say I can afford to lose the money better than you can, and if it hadn't been for your kindness to my girl this afternoon—this would never have happened. Now just slip off home, and let it be a warning to you to avoid gambling, and indulging in too much wine."

"It is very kind, indeed, of you, sir, and I thank you also for the gentle admonition, but as this is a debt of honour, I must insist upon your taking it back."

"Stuff and nonsense—come, be off and don't let me hear any more of this. Come and lunch with us to-morrow—to-morrow, why it's to-day—one thirty prompt—don't forget."

"Very well, sir, we will postpone the discussion until then."

* * * * *

The house in Fitzroy Street was the scene of an animated discussion early the next morning.

Three highly respectable gentlemen were what they called sharing the spoil. They were Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Martin—he of the saffron-hued countenance—and Maloney, the Italian waiter.

"You two can do and go where you like. I want half."

"Cool, Hammy, very. What about the expenses Tony and I have incurred?"

"And who risked the whole thing by swopping the note I'd like to know, not to mention the chance of Holloway?"

"I give you both credit for the work you have done, but mine has been the master mind. I formulated the scheme, worked it out to detail, and provided you and Tony with the necessary information. I kept you posted in that girl's movements, and——"

"Dry up, Hammy. Let's take equal share of the ex's and then you take two-thirds of the remainder. You see it cost a clear forty quid squaring those waiters at the café."

"You or Tony have that other tenner?"

"Oh, yes, my cherub, with the number—worse than stopped."

"Well, settle your own affairs yourselves; I must have my half now. I'm lunching with the Armitages in an hour's time and must be off."

"Strike me putrid, Hammy, but you're an' out-and-outer. What's the game now? Can we assist?"

"Not this time, I'm going in for the girl."

"By all that's blue if that isn't the coolest thing I've ever run across. Finger out his flimsies, Tony, he won't forget his pals when he's spliced."

And Mr. Hamilton left Fitzroy Street en route for his victim's house.

"Father will be down directly, Mr. Hamilton, he is with a very old friend of his—talking over old times, I suppose."

"I am glad of the opportunity, Miss May, to tell you how repentant I am for last night's affair. Indeed, were it not that your father absolutely refused to accept the money he lent me, I wouldn't have had the audacity to come here."

"Ah, but whose fault was it you had that bad note?"

"Quite so, my dear Miss May, but I oughn't to have taken so much wine, and I certainly should not have gone to that gambling place. If I could have been run in—I mean suspected of trying to pass bad money at some legitimate place, and had been taken to a police station, it would have made me quite happy."

"Really?"

"Yes, I should have felt what a football player would call 'nearer the goal.'"

Such a sweet blush.

"Ah! here is last night's victim of the note, Harrison. Let me introduce you?"

"Hamilton—General Harrison—a very old friend of mine."

Dead pause.

"Have you two met before?"

"I think I have had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Hamilton more than once. So you think this man the victim, do you? Armitage, he is the biggest scoundrel unhung."

"Come, come, Harrison, you are mistaken, surely."

"We'll soon see. Take off that wig. Take off that wig, I say."

Behold Mr. Hamilton with a semi-shaven head.

"Now send for the police. You hesitate, Armitage?"

"Look here, my man, you see the game's up; did you share in last night's business?"

"I did"—reluctantly.

"Well," gasped Mr. Armitage, "talk about the brigands of Italy—they are fools, simply fools. I should like to know how this has been so cleverly worked out though."

And he did.

Martin and Antonio Maloney made good their escape, but Hamilton (with scores of aliases), through his audacity, failed to reach the desired goal, but was successfully incarcerated.

Inspector Harris missed a golden opportunity of distinguishing himself.

THE PROPHECY.

I don't remember what day of August in the year 1816 it was that there came to the doors of the Captain-General of Granada a certain ragged and uncouth gipsy, seventy years of age, by trade a sheep-bearer, by name Heredia, astride of a lean and shambling black donkey whose whole equipment consisted of a halter about its neck!

The man, immediately on dismounting, said: "I want to see the Captain-General."

Needless to say, such presumption awoke in turn the resistance of the sentinel, the laugh of the orderlies, and the doubt and hesitancy of the aides-de-camp, before he was brought to the notice of the Most Excellent Señor Don Eugenio Portcarrero, then Captain-General of the ancient kingdom of Granada; but as that dignitary was a man of kindly disposition, and already knew of Heredia, renowned for his tricks, his bargains, and his love for his neighbour's goods, order was given to let the gipsy enter.

Once within the office, he fell on his knees, exclaiming: "Blessed be Mary, Most Holy, and long life to your Honour, ruler of this little world."

"Get up and leave off ceremony and tell me what you have to say," replied the Count with seeming severity.

Heredia at once drew a long face, and said: "Well, my lord, I have come that the thousand reals may be given me."

"What thousand reals?"

"Those offered a few days ago by proclamation to anyone bringing information about Parrón."

"Indeed! You knew him then?"

"No, sir."

"Well?"

"I know him now."

"How?"

"Very simply! I tracked him, I saw him, I bring the information, I claim the reward."

"Are you sure you have seen him?" said the Captain-General, with an interest that overcame his doubts.

The gipsy burst out laughing, and said: "It's very evident that your Honour thinks 'this gipsy is like them all, and wants to cheat me.' May God never forgive me if I lie! I saw Parrón yesterday."

"But do you realise the importance of what you are saying? Do you know that for years we have pursued this monster, this bandit, whom nobody has ever seen and lived? Do you know that every day, in different parts of the sierra he robs wayfarers and then shoots them, for, as he says, dead men tell no tales; and by this means only has he escaped being brought to justice? Finally, do you know that to see Parrón means death?"

The gipsy laughed again, and said: "Doesn't your Honour know that what a gipsy cannot do no one on earth can? Does anyone know when our laughing or crying is real? Does your Honour know a fox as tricky as we are? I repeat, General, that not only have I seen Parrón, but I have talked with him."

"Where?"

"On the road to Tózar."

"Give me proof."

"Listen, your Honour! Yesterday morning, eight days since, my donkey and I fell into the hands of some robbers. They bound me fast, and led me through some bewildering hollows till we came to the clearing where the bandits camped; a cruel suspicion laid hold on me. 'Can these be Parrón's people?' I was constantly asking myself; 'if so, there's no remedy, for this devil has decreed that eyes that have seen his face shall never see another.'

"While I was thus cogitating there approached me a man, strangely but elegantly dressed, who, slapping me on the shoulder, said: 'Friend! I am Parrón!'

"To hear this and fall backwards was one and the same thing. The bandit burst out laughing. I arose, trembling, fell on my knees, and cried out in every tone of voice I could muster: 'Blessed be thy soul, king of men! Who would not have known thee by the princely bearing God has given thee! May there be mothers to bear more such sons! Let me kiss you, my son! May this little gipsy die in torment if he was not wishing to meet you and tell your fortune, and kiss your lordly hands. Behold me at your service. Do you want to know how to trade dead donkeys for live ones? Do you want to sell your old horses for the price of young ones? Do you want to teach French to a mule?'"

The Count Montijo could not suppress a laugh. Then he asked: "And what said Parrón to all this? What did he do?"

"The same as your Honour; he laughed with all his might."

"And you?"

"I, my lord, laughed, too, while tears as big as oranges ran down my cheeks."

"Proceed!"

"Presently he held out his hand to me, and said: 'Friend, you are the only man of talent that has fallen in my power; all the others have had the bad taste to annoy me by weeping and wailing and the like nonsense, which puts me into a bad humour; you alone have made me laugh, and if it were not for these tears——'

"'What? Your Honour, they are for joy!'

"'I believe it, you poor fool. It's the first time for six or seven years that I have laughed; truth is, I haven't wept either. But let us hasten. Eh, boys?'

"For Parrón to say this, and for me to be surrounded by a ring of blunderbusses was quicker than a wink. 'Have mercy on me!' I began to screech.

"'Halt!' cried Parrón. 'We are not ready for this yet. I called you to find out what you took from this man.'

"'A donkey with his hide on.'

"'And money?'

"'Three duros and seventy reals.'

"'Now then, leave us alone,' and they all withdrew.

"'Now tell me my fortune,' said the robber, extending his hand to me. I took hold of it and thought a moment. I knew I was in a position to speak freely, so I said to him, with all the conviction of my heart: 'Parrón, sooner or later, whether you take my life or leave it to me, you will die on the gallows!'

"'I know that already,' answered the bandit with perfect calmness. 'Tell me when!'

"I began to consider. This man, said I to myself, is going to free me; to-morrow I'll be in Granada, and preach; the next day they'll take him; then the trial will begin. 'Do you ask when?' I said aloud. 'Then take notice, it will be during next month.'

"Parrón shuddered and so did I, fearing my love of fortune-telling would be my death.

"'Look you, gipsy,' replied Parrón very deliberately, 'you will remain in my power, and if by the end of next month they do not hang me, I will hang you, as sure as they hanged my father. If I die by that time you will go free.'

"'Much obliged,' said I to myself, 'to pardon me after death,' and I repented for having made the time so short. We stayed at the aforesaid camp, and I was locked up in a cave, while Parrón mounted his mare, and took the track through the bushes."

"All right," said the Count, "I understand; Parrón is dead; you are free; and therefore you know his whereabouts."

"Quite the contrary, my General! Parrón is alive! And now comes the blackest part of my story.

"A week passed without the Captain coming to see us, and, as far as I could make out, he had not shown himself in the neighbourhood since the evening I told his fortune; a thing not at all extraordinary, as my guards told me. For, do you know, the chief goes away alone occasionally, and doesn't return till it suits him. The fact is, we know nothing whatever of him during these long absences. About this time, by force of entreaty, and having told the fortunes of the band, prognosticating freedom from hanging and comfortable old age for all, I had succeeded in getting them to take me out during the evenings, and bind me to a tree, for I was smothering with heat in the cell. Needless to say, there was a pair of them continually at my side.

"One evening, about six o'clock, the robbers who had been on 'duty' by command of Parrón's lieutenant, returned to camp, bringing with them a miserable reaper forty to fifty years old, manacled, and crying fit to break one's heart. 'Give me back my twenty duros!' he said. 'Ah, if you only knew what it cost me to earn them! A whole summer's reaping in the sun! A whole summer away from my wife and children! And so I scraped together by my toil and self-denial this sum, that we might live this winter, and that on reaching home I might embrace them, and pay the debts the unfortunate ones have contracted, so that they might live. Ought I to lose this money, which is a fortune to me? Pity, gentlemen! Give me my twenty duros, for the sake of the most Holy Mary of Sorrows.'

"A mocking laugh answered the plaints of the old man. Bound as I was to the tree, I shook with terror! For gipsies, too, have families.

"'Don't be a fool!' finally said a bandit, going to the reaper. 'You do wrong in thinking of money when more important matters should occupy your thoughts.'

"'How?' said the reaper, not supposing there could be a greater misfortune than his children going without bread.

"'You are in Parrón's hands.'

"'Parrón? I don't know him—never heard of him. I come a long way; I belong to Alicante, and was reaping in Sevilla.'

"'But, my friend, Parrón means death! Everyone that falls into our hands must die; therefore, make your will in two minutes, and your peace with God in the next two. Make ready! Aim! You have four minutes.'

"'I am going to improve them. Hear me, for pity's sake.'

"'Speak.'

"'I have six children and one unfortunate—widow, I will say, since I must die; for I read in your eyes that you are worse than wild beasts—yes, worse—for beasts of the same species do not destroy each other. Oh, pardon! I know not what I say. Gentlemen, some one of you must be a father! Is there not a father—is there not a father among you? Do you know what it is to have children starving all the winter? Do you know what it is for a mother to see the children of her blood die, crying: "I am hungry; I am cold?" Gentlemen, I don't want to live without them; for what would life be to me?—a chain of toil and privation. But I must live for my children's sake—oh, my children, children, of my heart!'

"The father dragged himself along the ground and turned his face to the robbers. Such a face! It seemed like one of those saints that King Nero threw to the lions, as the preachers say. The robbers felt something stir within their breasts; then they looked at one another, and, seeing all were of one accord, one made bold to say——"

"What said he?" asked the Captain-General, deeply affected by the story.

"He said: 'Comrades, what we are about to do must never be known to Parrón.'

"'Never! Never!' muttered the rest of the bandits.

"'Go thy way, good man,' said another, almost weeping, and I made signs to the reaper that he should instantly go.

"'Quick! March!' they said, and all turned their backs. The reaper held out his hand beseechingly.

"'Aren't you satisfied?' growled one. 'Do you want your money besides? Go! go! Do not try our patience!'

"The poor father went away weeping, and soon was out of sight.

"Perhaps a half-hour later, and which was taken up by the bandits swearing one another not to tell the Captain they had freed a man, there suddenly appeared Parrón, leading the reaper alongside his mare.

"The bandits fell back astounded. Parrón dismounted leisurely, unslung his two-barrelled carbine, and aiming at his comrades, said: 'Fools! Idiots! I know not why I do not shoot every one of you! Quick! give back to this man the twenty duros you took from him!' The robbers produced the money and gave it to the reaper, who cast himself at the feet of the bandit chief who had so kind a heart.

"Parrón said to him: 'By the peace of Heaven! without your directions I never should have found them. Now, you see you mistrusted me without cause. I have fulfilled my promise—you have your twenty duros. Now be off!'

"The reaper kissed him again and again, and departed full of joy; but he had gone hardly fifty paces when his benefactor called him anew, and the poor man hastened to retrace his steps.

"'What is your command?' said he, anxious to do a service to him who had restored happiness to his family.

"'Do you know Parrón?' asked the man himself.

"'I know him not.'

"'You mistake,' said the chief, 'I am he!'

Digitized by Google

"The reaper stood stupefied. Parrón brought his carbine to his cheek and fired both barrels at the reaper, who fell rolling on the ground.

"'May you be accursed,' were the only words he spoke. During the terror that blinded me I felt the tree to which I was bound quiver slightly, and that my bonds were loose. One of the balls after having wounded the reaper, hit the cord which held me fast, and cut it. I concealed my freedom and waited a chance for escape. Meantime Parrón, pointing to the reaper, said to his men: 'Now you can rob him. You pack of idiots! You lot of fools! To free this man that he might go as he did, howling along the highway! Fortunately it was I that met him, and learnt what had happened, for had it been the soldiers, he would have shown them the way to this camp, same as he did to me, and we would all have been in prison by this. See the result of robbing and not killing; but enough of preaching, bury this body before it rot.'

"While the robbers were digging a grave, Parrón was feeding, with his back to me. Little by little I moved from the tree, and slipped down a hollow near by. It was already night, and shielded by the darkness, I set out with all haste. By the starlight I found my donkey who was quietly feeding, tied to an ash-tree. I mounted him and never stopped till I got here. Therefore, my lord, give me the thousand reals, and I will put you on Parrón's track, who, by-the-bye, has kept my three-and-a-half duros."

The gipsy, having given a description of the bandit, afterwards received the promised reward, and departed from the General's office, leaving the Count and a person then present, from whom I had these details, utterly confounded. It remains to be seen whether Heredia guessed aright when he foretold Parrón's destiny.

Fifteen days after the scene we have just described took place, about nine in the morning, a large crowd of idlers attended the assembling of two companies of soldiers in the streets of San Juan de Dios and part of that of San Felipe, in the aforesaid capital city, who, about a half-hour later, were to set out in quest of Parrón, the description of his hiding-place, his person, and his comrades having been finally approved by the Count of Montijo. The interest and excitement of the public was extraordinary, and none the less so was the soberness with which the soldiers took leave of families and friends before starting on so important an expedition: such fear had Parrón aroused throughout the whole kingdom of Granada.

"Seems we are ready to fall in," said one soldier to his comrade. "But I don't see Cabo-Lopéz."

"That's strange, too, for he was always on hand first of any when there was talk of hunting Parrón. He hated him with all his heart."

"So, don't you know what has happened?" said a third one, joining in the talk.

"Hello! this must be our new man. How do you like our company?"

"Very well, indeed," answered the one inquired of, a man of pale complexion and fine shape, which was partly hidden by the uniform.

"What were you saying?" asked the first.

"Ah, yes. Cabo-Lopéz is dead," replied the pale-faced one.

"Manuel! What are you talking about? This can't be. I, myself, saw Lopéz this morning, surely as I see you now."

Manuel said: "Half-an-hour ago Parrón killed him."

"Parrón! Where?"

"Right here in Granada. They found Lopéz's dead body on the Dog's Hill."

All kept silent except Manuel, who began to whistle a patriotic air.

"Eleven men gone in six days," said a sergeant. "Parrón means to exterminate us! But how comes it that he is in Granada? Aren't we going to look in the Sierra-de-Loja?"

Manuel ceased whistling, and said with his usual recklessness: "An old woman who saw the deed says that since he killed Lopéz, she hopes, if we look for him, we may have the pleasure of seeing him."

"Comrade! aren't you pretty bold to speak of Parrón with such contempt?"

"Well, is Parrón more than a man?" asked Manuel with a shrug.

Just then "Fall in!" was shouted by various tongues. The two companies formed and roll call was begun.

Now it happened that at that moment Heredia was going by, and like everyone else, stopped to admire the soldiers.

It seemed as if Manuel, the new soldier, gave a start, and fell back a little so as to hide behind his comrades, when Heredia caught sight of him, gave a yell, and, jumping as if he had stepped on a viper, started to run up San Yeronimos Street.

Manuel raised his musket and aimed at the gipsy, but another soldier was quick enough to strike the gun up, and the shot was spent in the air.

"He's crazy! Manuel has gone mad! A soldier has lost his wits!" was shouted in succession by the lookers-on, and officers, sergeants, and privates fell on the man, who was struggling to escape, and whom, after they had subdued him, they plied with questions, accusations and insults which drew from him no response whatever. Meantime, Heredia had been seized by some passers-by, who, seeing him running and hearing the musket shot, took him for a malefactor.

"Lead me to the Captain-General," said the gipsy; "I must speak to the Count of Montijo—Count of Montijo, indeed!"

"Who have you killed?" asked his captors. "Here comes the guard and they'll know what to do with you."

"I think so, too," said Heredia, "but be careful not to let Parrón kill me."

"What do you mean by Parrón? What's the man talking about?"

"Come and you will see," and, so saying, the gipsy made them take him to the Commandant of the platoon, and, pointing to Manuel, he said: "Commandant, this is Parrón, and I am the gipsy who two weeks ago gave a description of him to the Count of Montijo."

"Parrón! Parrón is taken! A soldier proved to be Parrón!" shouted the crowd.

"No doubt about it," said the Commandant, reading the order given him by the Captain-General. "We certainly have been very stupid; but who would have thought of looking for the robber chief among the very soldiers that were searching for him."

"Fool that I am," Parrón was saying to himself, regarding the gipsy with eyes wonderfully like a lion's. "He is the only man to whom I ever granted life. I deserve what has happened."

The week following Parrón was executed, and so the gipsy's prophecy was literally fulfilled.

THE PORTRAIT OF A SINGER

It had been a white morning for Kenyon.

A quick lightness and elation marked his step as he paced to and fro before his easel. His head was high, his grey eyes bright, and his shrill whistle rang joyously through the studio, flooded from the lofty skylight with pale April radiance. His brush dashed at the canvas impetuously, confidently; a hundred little inspirations of the happy moment guiding it to the desired effect. It seemed he could do nothing amiss.

The slim, white-armed girl on the model-throne—an exquisite harmony of singing tones—appeared to glow with some reflection of the painter's face. She had posed in perfection, with but a five-minutes' rest, for two hours. Two hours which seemed like twenty minutes to Kenyon, tramping absorbedly backwards and forwards over the fragments of his cherished meerschaum, an old friend unheedingly sacrificed in a moment's frenzy of delight.

Now and then he warbled contentedly, in a thin falsetto, an air which resembled nothing in particular; and then fell to whistling again, with short intervals of contemplative silence, always succeeded by a simultaneous outburst of paint and vocal jubilation.

It was a morning in a thousand. And there yet remained another good hour of the sitting, with much to be done. When, therefore, the little electric bell at the door suddenly thrilled out sharply, Kenyon only stopped short in the midst of the "Habanera," scowled viciously, and went on with his work. The dead silence which fell upon the room had not the desired effect of routing the unwelcome visitor. After the lapse of a long minute the bell rang again; and this appeal, evoking from within nothing except an imprecation sufficiently deep, but audible, was succeeded by a smart knock on the panel of the door.

Kenyon crossed the room to assure himself that the bolt protected him from forcible invasion; and satisfied that it did, he was about to turn away, when a lady's visiting card was pushed over the lintel. He waited another minute and then, assuming that the owner had departed, went and picked up the card. It read "Baroness Folkner von Tannhausen," and, written in pencil below the name, "begs that Mr. Kenyon will give her a short interview on urgent business."

Whether from gallantry or curiosity or apparent necessity, Kenyon yielded. He shrugged his shoulders, with a look of bored vexation, called to the model, "Rest, Mamie," and when the shimmer of her green robes had disappeared in the little corridor, which separated his living-room from the studio, he unbolted and opened the outer door.

A short woman, dressed in mourning, rustled past him, bending her head slightly in answer to his somewhat ironical bow. Kenyon silently set a chair for her, and she seated herself, putting aside the heavy crape veil from her face.

"Mr. Kenyon," she said, "I hope you'll forgive me for intruding in this way. I know you were busy, but I was so anxious to see you—and I sail to-morrow morning."

She spoke with perfect fluency, but yet with an undefinable accent, which was not German; while her mature and faded charms were of a surprising type: half Spanish, half Oriental. Her manner had a certain authority, which fitted better, perhaps, than her title, but not so well as her gown. It was the self-confidence of a woman accustomed to admiration and applause—hardly that of the "great lady" to whom the title and name, by no means unknown, seemed to point.

Kenyon walked to a small table near by, laid down his palette and brushes, and returned.

"I am at your disposal, madam," he said coldly.

"I wish—I wish to ask you to execute a commission for me—a portrait."

A slight nervousness here manifested itself in her manner. Her long, black eyes, which, with the straight brows and narrow forehead, were now the sole charm of her face, left Kenyon's and roved restlessly over the pale-toned walls, lined half-way up with canvases framed and unframed, in all stages of evolution. Other canvases were stacked at the back of the studio, partly concealed by a large screen of Moorish fretwork, over which had been thrown a heap of gauzy orange-coloured draperies, and the black eyes rested on these.

She went on abruptly: "You painted not long ago, I believe, a portrait of Karl Savary, the singer—is it not so?"

"Yes," said Kenyon, in some surprise.

"What has become of that picture?"

"It is here."

"Here—in this place?"

"Yes, madam."

"How is that—it is not your property?"

"Yes," said Kenyon. He went on, half unwillingly, half amused at this catechism: "You see, the picture was not quite finished at the time of Savary's death. His affairs were left in confusion. His relatives are poor people in Germany—and, in short, the portrait remains with me."

"Is it for sale?—but why do I ask? Mr. Kenyon, what I want is a small copy of that picture. Will you make it for me?"

Kenyon hesitated a few moments, looking curiously at his visitor. Her request had suggested to him an odd train of ideas. Across these suddenly flashed into his mind the remembrance of a face like and unlike this matronly, double-chinned, coarse-fleshed countenance—a young face, with the same glancing eyes and narrow brow, but full of life and colour.

"I have seen you somewhere," he said, with unconscious brusqueness.

She made a quick movement of exasperation, and the colour rose dully in her dark cheeks.

"Very likely. But what difference does that make? You have not answered me."

"I beg your pardon," said Kenyon slowly, realising that her eyes had been on his with an intense eagerness. Plainly she attached no little importance to the request. His first impulse had been to refuse, but after a moment he said slowly:

"I don't know. I am very busy just at present——"

"A month—two months, then? Can I have it in two months?"

"Well—yes. In two months."

She drew a long breath. "And now, may I see the picture? I have heard much of it. I have even seen a photograph of it. It has been exhibited here, yes? But show it to me, please."

She rose to her feet and threw the long veil back over her shoulders. Her eyes were very bright, her whole face almost childishly eager. Despite her years and her stoutness, which the lines of her well-cut gown did not succeed in concealing, she still possessed a certain attraction—the charm of a woman secure of herself, accustomed to please.

Kenyon withdrew his eyes from her with an effort due less to this charm than to the faint-floating ghost of a recollection which teased him with its persistent intangibility. He dragged out from behind the Moorish screen a large canvas, and with some difficulty, due to its unwieldly size, got it across the room and put it into the gilt frame destined for it when complete. The Baroness stood with her back to him. He spoke to her twice. Then suddenly she wheeled about and faced the picture. Her eyes dilated, her lips parted.

"Dios mio! It is he!" she murmured.

Her face seemed like a translucent mask behind which some pale radiance flickered in gusts. All at once her eyes brimmed over. Her gloves, which she had stripped off, fell to the floor, and her hands, glittering with immense diamonds, clasped a richly-jewelled cross which flashed from the crape folds of her corsage. After some moments she turned and looked up at Kenyon through her tears as frankly as a child.

"He was a dear friend of mine," she said softly. "He died here, far away from—from his home. You must have seen him often; you must have known him well—to paint him like that. Tell me—tell me something of him."

"Yes, I knew him in a way," said Kenyon absently. "I saw him nearly every day while that was going on," indicating the picture. "And yet I didn't know him well. But"—here he hesitated and his voice softened, "I was with him when he died."

"Ah—h!"

She moved backwards, her eyes still on his, and sank into a chair, and Kenyon, momentarily forgetting his interrupted work and the model waiting behind the screen, sat down near her.

"You know it was pneumonia," he went on. "He had taken a bad cold somehow, and he persisted in working on in spite of the doctors. It was the first big season of Wagner opera here, and the success of it depended on Savary; and, of course, he knew it. He finished the week with a great performance of 'Tannhäuser'—then went home to his hotel and gave up. Before morning he was delirious; they had to take him to the hospital. He died there three days later at daybreak."

The Baroness dried her eyes, and twisted her handkerchief in and out of her begemmed fingers.

"And you were with him those two days?"

"Yes. He was delirious nearly all the time. He never knew me."

"And did he suffer much during this terrible illness?"

"Poor fellow—yes."

She shivered, caught her breath, and her lips quivered.

"It was very—good of you, Mr. Kenyon——"

"No. There seemed to be no one else."

"No one else? No one—out of all who loved him? Oh, Heavens!"

She bowed her face in her hands; then, after a little while, looked up, carefully dried her eyes again, and said, with an effort at composure:

"Pardon me for distressing you. It is very bad taste, I know. But tell me one thing more. When he was delirious—he talked a great deal, of course."

"Yes. But most in some German dialect with which I am not familiar. I caught only a word here and there—generally something about his home, or the lake and the linden trees——"

"Ah, yes—poor boy! He was so young and strong—to die like that. His beautiful face, his beautiful voice—gone, gone for ever! But the good God knows best." She bent her head and pressed the diamond cross to her lips. Then she looked up quickly, piercingly, at Kenyon. "Did he speak any name, do you remember? any woman's name?"

"No. He called several times for his mother."

"Poor boy, he has found her now. You are quite sure—no other name?"

"I heard no other," said Kenyon, with a little frown of displeasure.

She turned her head and looked long and silently at the picture.

"I have seen him like that so often," she murmured.

"Dios mio! It is he!" she murmured.

"What a chest—what arms! Golden hair, golden voice—heart of gold! He was a man!"

Suddenly she rose. "Pardon me for taking so much of your time, Mr. Kenyon. I am ashamed of my thoughtlessness. And now—my picture?"

"You shall have it in two months."

"Thank you. I will give you the address of my banker in Berlin. Please send it to him, securely packed, as soon as it is finished." She handed Kenyon a card and a slip of blue paper. "I had brought that cheque with me, but if it is not right——"

"It is quite right, thank you."

She gave a last, long look at the picture, then dropped her veil over her face, thanked Kenyon again, and finally departed.

Kenyon went back to his easel, and the model came out and resumed her pose. But somehow the light and atmosphere—or perhaps the painter's mood—had changed. He was preoccupied and absent. The delicious problem of his colour scheme—pale terra cotta and golden green as a setting for youthful pink flesh and auburn hair—had ceased to promise a near solution. The splendid vision of the early morning had begun to fade into the inevitable light of common day. Yet he worked on conscientiously until the half-past twelve whistle announced the end of the sitting. Very promptly then he laid down his palette, nodded to the model, and began to clean his brushes, whistling pensively the while. By this time he had washed his hands and put on his coat and hat; the girl, too, was ready and they went out together.

On the days when the little Irishwoman sat to Kenyon—and these were frequent, for she was a favourite model (the head and hands and the draped figure)—the two were accustomed to lunch in company at a small French restaurant on—or, rather under—the dingy little square. This establishment consisted of a single basement room, low ceiled, and lit perpetually by sparse, unshaded gas-jets, which flared strongly at intervals, leaving the greater part of the place in darkness. But it was clean and cheap, had a reputation among the Bohemians of the quarter for old cheese, crusty bread, and fresh salads, and was accordingly frequented by many who might have afforded a more pretentious ménage.

Kenyon, habited to the place, had his special seat at a small table in a corner, where it was his pleasure, while imbibing the foaming beer or the mild red wines, to lie in wait for savage effects of light and shade, which he always thought he would utilise, but never did.

To-day he was in an unresponsive mood. He drank his hock and ate his bread and cheese, half listening to his companion's brisk chatter, putting in a word now and then, or smiling at some flash of her mischievous wit, but oftener ignoring her altogether. When he had finished his frugal meal, he fished out a short, black pipe from his inner pocket, and proceeded to add his quota to the coil of blue smoke that undulated along the ceiling. After a long silence, he said abruptly, shutting his teeth on the stem of his pipe:

"Bother the woman! I wish I knew where I've seen her!"

"Seen who? The lady in mourning, you mean? I'll tell you, if you like," said the girl readily.

"Pooh! You don't know her, do you?"

"Never saw her till I looked through the crack of the door this morning. But I'll bet I can tell where you saw her. On the stage."

"By jove! I believe you're right!" exclaimed Kenyon instantly. "I wonder," he added meditatively.

"Yes, a singer—or dancer. Retired, of course, and rich—probably married," she added, nodding her head sagely.

"Look here, Mamie, I'll tell you a story," began Kenyon, smiling whimsically. Then he stopped suddenly and said to himself, "No, I won't either. I'll tell it to her," and added, aloud, "some other day."

With that he got up unceremoniously, and after paying toll to fat Madame Lefebevre at the desk, went out, followed by the model's twinkling glance.

Perhaps it was the idea of Constance which drove Kenyon out of that tobacco and garlic-scented atmosphere away from the red-haired girl sitting with her elbows on the table and her narrow eyes blinking in the glare of the gas. In there it seemed somehow a profanation to think of her. He strolled on round the little square, pipe in mouth, his hat pulled down over his eyes and his hands plunged deep into the pockets of his loose overcoat. It was an unfashionable neighbourhood, and he attracted no more than a passing glance from the noisy children crowding the pavement. He noted abstractedly that the thin branches of the few lime-trees were studded with swelling buds, and that a faint green was suffusing the dusty plots where the fat sparrows wrangled; and recollected suddenly that the morrow would be Easter Sunday. A faint brooding smile lit his dreamy eyes as a radiant figure all in palest grey, grey-eyed and bright-haired, dawned on his inward vision. The incident of the morning had by this time quite faded from his mind. He was thinking now of the woman whom his love and reverence set apart from all other women. He was thinking that he was to see her that same afternoon.

He went back to his rooms, spent two hours over an edition of "Maurice de Guérin," which he was interleaving with drawings; then dressed and, stopping at a florist's on his way, started for Kensington.

The ladies were at home, the butler told him, and after a brief delay he was shown into the "morning-room," a small apartment separated from the library by Indian hangings, and opening into a miniature conservatory. The little nook, with its tempered light and soft blending of dull pinks and greens, had the air of an hothouse, and the slender girl on the divan among the gold cushions was like a lily grown under glass.

"But you are going out!" exclaimed Kenyon disappointedly, releasing her long, gloved fingers.

"Yes—to drive, and afterwards to a tea or two," said Constance, smiling. "Aunt Jem insists on my driving an hour every day—to bring back my colour, she says. As though I had ever had colour!"

"Then I won't repine," said Kenyon, taking a chair near her and dropping his violets in her lap, "for you certainly look paler than I like. Aren't you dissipating too much?"

"Dissipating—not much!"

"You know you're scarcely strong yet. If you don't look out you'll be packed off for another sea voyage."

Constance laughed and turned the question.

The acquaintance between these two was of little more than a year's duration, the latter three months of which time Constance had spent in Provence and Southern Spain. But before her sudden departure at the beginning of the season, this acquaintance had progressed so far that there was—at least on Kenyon's side—no question of allowing it to drop, and it had been continued through those three months by letter. It may have been due to the interest and charm which Kenyon was able to infuse into his share of the correspondence that the two met again not as acquaintances, but as friends at least. For he wrote with his soul in his finger-tips, alive and alert to seek out that other soul to which all his hope addressed itself.

Almost from the very first meeting of all, he had acknowledged to himself—this philosophic dreamer of forty—that henceforth life held something for him beyond philosophy, or dreams, or love as he had known it, or, perhaps, art even, the master and crucible of all. She was so completely what a woman worth winning must be! Her patrician grace, her reserve, her youthful coldness, caprice even, seemed the entire fulfilment of an ideal which must always have lurked somewhere in his heart! He had never even wondered at his own swift and utter subjugation.

It was part of the scheme of things, and so, too, was the promise which had begun to shine for him in her serene eyes. The definite word had not yet been spoken. The lingering on the threshold had its charm, to Kenyon even.

Meantime his position in the house was perfectly assured, if not defined exactly. Mrs. Ferriss, the aunt with whom Constance lived, approved of him, both from the worldly and the personal point of view. Indeed, she had been known privately to declare that were it not for Mr. Ferriss she would have married him herself.

"You shall drive with us this afternoon, if you like," said Constance graciously, fastening the violets into the belt of her gown. "And you may as well go to the Caswells' tea, too. I hope you were intending to go? Just think of the dinners you've eaten in that house!"

"I know, but there won't be any more—dinners, I mean—till next season. However, I'll accept for the drive, with many thanks. And, by-the-way, when are you going to let me paint you in that gown? You promised, you know. And I've been dreaming of it. That grey, with the pink and lavender lights—it looks like a mist with a rainbow caught in it!"

"How poetical—if you could only paint your dream! You should have done it some time in Lent. You might have painted me in this Paris hat, and called the picture 'A Penitent!' But you must be too busy now. We haven't seen you for days. What have you been doing ever since—let me see—Thursday?"

"Oh, pegging away, as usual. I've been working hard on the 'Oread,' and it's coming—I think! Our exhibition opens in two weeks, you know, and I want that to go in. It's going to be the best thing I've done. The colour of the girl in her green gown—it's great!"

"Yes, I dare say. You painters all rave over red-haired girls. But what else shall you send?"

"Oh, a landscape or two—just to show those fellows that I can paint a landscape—and the portrait of Savary."

"Savary! I thought—I did not know you had that yet."

"Yes, for the present. I've been touching up some details a bit. I shall give it to the same gallery eventually, I think. It's the best thing I've done so far. You think so, don't you?"

"Well, I hardly know. I didn't see it after it was finished. It promised to be—very good, I remember."

"It has attracted a good deal of attention, principally, of course, because of Savary's sudden death, and because it's the only decent portrait of him. You remember the sensation his death made, don't you? Or was it just after you sailed? No, it was just before, I recollect now. Well, the portrait was nearly finished then; fortunately the figure was complete, or fairly so. People kept coming in and begging to see it. So I sent it to a little exhibition at the 'Paint and Clay,' unfinished as it was. But that was after you went away. I thought, though, that I had shown it to you since you came back!"

"I never saw it but once; no, twice. The first time, you remember, Aunt Jem and I came to the studio."

"I remember. You spoiled the sitting. Savary wouldn't keep his head in pose for looking at you. And then you went to the piano and sang something from Carmen, and Savary struck in with the Toreador's song, and then you sang some duet or the other. And I sat on the model throne and twiddled my thumbs. It was good music, though. What a voice he had!"

Constance laughed suddenly. "And I went to your studio again one day. You weren't there, but I made your boy let me in, and I went poking about among your things."

"You did! Well! He never told me!"

Kenyon regarded her with puzzled surprise. She took the violets from her belt and nervously pulled them apart.

"Yes. I always meant to tell you. It was a freak. And I saw the picture again. That was the last time."

There was a short silence.

"Speaking of Savary reminds me," began Kenyon; but paused there at the sibilant rustle of silken petticoats approaching.

"Dear Mr. Kenyon, so glad to see you! You are just in time to drive with us. No, do sit down again; there is no hurry—and don't let me interrupt you. You were talking about a pet enthusiasm of mine, weren't you, Constance, love? I mean Karl Savary. Mr. Kenyon, I had an immense admiration for that man—his voice, his beauty, his genius! His death was a great shock to me. You know he sang here on several of our Sunday evenings when he wouldn't sing at other houses for love or money. The last time was just a week before he died—think of it!"

Mrs. Ferriss sank gently into a chair and nodded her pretty head, crowned with the gayest of French bonnets.

"He was rather a favourite with your charming sex, I think," said Kenyon smoothly. "That is to say, behind the glitter of the footlights; or, perhaps, as the lion of a soirée—a lion with a well-kept mane and a most musical roar, certainly. For I don't suppose you knew him personally?"

"Oh, no, I don't mean that, of course. No doubt in private life he drank too much beer and ate unpleasant things, and was generally unromantic—poor fellow! I never talked with him, really, for he spoke very little English, you know—Constance got on better with him, I believe. But just to sit and look at him! And when he sang—who could be coldly rational with that voice fairly drawing the heart out of your breast——"

"Don't be absurd, Aunt Jem," said Constance rather sharply, decapitating violets.

"Constance, dear, you used to think so yourself. You were very fond of Herr Savary's singing."

"Was I?" said Constance coldly. "Mr. Kenyon, you were saying something when Aunt Jem came in. Go on, please."

"Oh," said Kenyon, after a moment, "I remember. It was a rather curious little coincidence that occurred this morning; that is, one incident did. The other happened some time ago."

He went on to describe his visitor of the morning ending with:

"She appears now as a German baroness, but I am quite certain that I recollect her eight or ten years ago as a distinguished ornament of the burlesque stage. She was a Cuban, and a beautiful creature, too. No doubt her title and rank are genuine enough, for I indistinctly remember that she retired from the public eye at the zenith of her fame, and married an admirer who was said to be both rich and noble. Ease and prosperity haven't altogether agreed with her, though. She has lost her beauty. Some three months ago, just after Savary's death, I executed another commission of exactly the same sort—a small copy of this very picture—for a woman, too. Odd, isn't it?"

"Odd—it's fascinating! But, tell us, who was the other woman?"

"I don't know. I never saw her. A messenger boy brought me her note, written on the sort of paper and in the sort of hieroglyphic hand that most women—ladies, I mean—use nowadays. The note was unsigned and undated, and simply asked if I would make such a copy at once, on my own terms. I was to send a reply by the messenger, stating the earliest date when I could complete it. As it happened, I wasn't very busy just at that time, and I despatched an acceptance. A week later came another note in the same way, thanking me, enclosing—no, not a cheque, dear Mrs. Ferriss, but a packet of notes, and asking me to have the picture, when finished, put into an ebony frame, fitted with doors that could be locked. I sent an answer, promising to do so.

"Well, that is about all. I finished the picture. On the appointed day another messenger came and carried it away. And that was the end of it. Another of his flames, I fancy. I cannot understand why women should so humiliate themselves."

Constance was still tearing the violets to pieces and Mrs. Ferriss exclaimed softly:

"How mysterious! I should have tried to find out who she was. But are you sure it was a woman? Of course, though, it must have been. But why the locked doors, do you suppose? Altogether it is a real story—you ought to write it up and print it. I shall always look at your portrait now with a new interest. But it is odd that you never mentioned anything of this to us before, isn't it, Constance? And about you being with that poor young man in his illness, and when he died—he never told us of it, did he, Constance?"

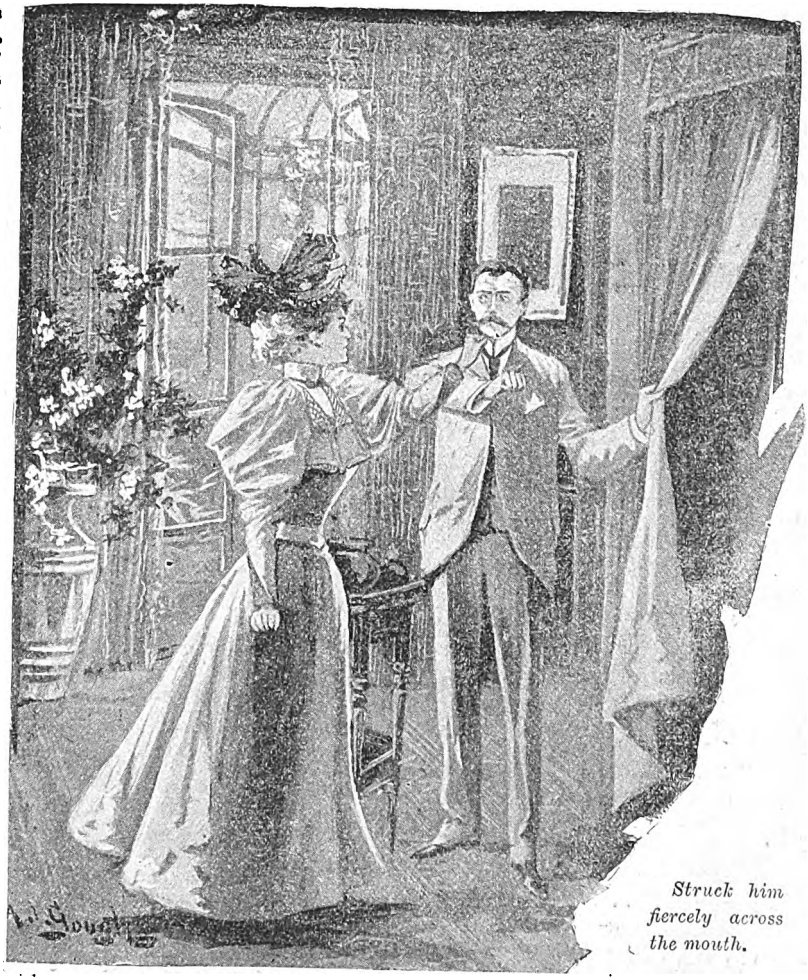
"No, he never told us of it," echoed the girl.

She got up, dropping the violets from her lap, and crossed the room to the fireplace, where a small bed of coals smouldered dimly under a veil of grey ashes.

"And now we must really be going," said Mrs. Ferriss briskly, rising and drawing her velvet wrap about her shoulders.

"I'm afraid I've kept you ——," began Kenyon.

"Indeed you haven't. We are in plenty of time for our drive—a good long one, too, that ought to bring a little colour to this girl's pale cheeks."



Struck him fiercely across the mouth.

Kenyon held the portière aside for her, and she called over her shoulder:

"Come, Constance!"

The girl, standing with her back to them, started imperceptibly. There was a little crash, and the fragments of a Sèvres cup tinkled on the tiles of the fireplace.

As she swept past Kenyon out of the room she struck him fiercely across the mouth.

THE PHANTOM OF BEN SEID.

MY uncle was a soldier, and feared nothing. My uncle was a philosopher, and believed nothing. He listened to priest and parson with equal disgust. He looked upon the church and chapel with equal contempt. He went beyond his school, he was not even a Bhuddist! I have said that my uncle believed nothing. The assertion is too broad; he believed in ruins. In search of them he travelled over Europe, at great expense and with immense discomforts.

In France he heard of an old Moorish castle in Southern Spain, which nobody had "done" in a hundred years. An Englishman had attempted it, but had succumbed for want of beef and surfeit of garlic, and had returned. A Frankfort Jew, in pursuit of an absconding debtor, had penetrated to within a league of it. The hospitable inhabitants had demanded that he should embrace the true religion. The misguided man had refused. He, also, had returned, but without ears! A Frenchman had thought to reach it. He had taken a guide across the mountains, and had not returned.

My uncle was delighted. He paid his bill; he ordered horses; he set out at once for Spain. At the frontiers he dismissed his horses, and took the national conveyance. In crossing the Pyrenees his animal made a false step on the edge of a precipice. As the mule fell out, my uncle fell in. The animal descended several hundred feet, and was broken to a jelly. His rider fell in a narrow path, and was but slightly bruised.

The muleteer, exasperated at the loss of his beast, discharged at my uncle a vituperative epithet. My uncle replied with a threat of the next Alcalde. The muleteer discharged his carbine; the bullet grazed my uncle's head. His reply to this is not recorded, but the next party found, sitting in the path, a muleteer, who had reported that an Inglees had shot him and stolen his mule. This party, being English, felt bound to make reparation. They gave the driver a thrashing and passed on.

My uncle, also, passed on, with as much haste as is possible in Spain, in the direction of Seville. There was no beef, the wine was poor, the bread bad, the chickens tough, the garlic detestable; but the eggs were the best in the world. He subsisted on the latter.

In as short a time as would be required for the grand pilgrimage to Mecca, he arrived at the passes of Seville. He stopped at a wretched inn, and asked for a guide. The innkeeper knew an excellent one. Indeed, he knew the prince of guides. He had conducted many over; he had never conducted any back. The prince of guides was brought. He smelled of garlic and looked villainous, which was natural. He was polite, and named a reasonable sum for his services, which was suspicious.

They set out at once. On entering the pass, my uncle asked to borrow his conductor's musket. The Spaniard declined to lend. My uncle held a pistol to his head, and he consented. Slinging the captured musket to the saddle of his mule, my uncle commanded the conductor to keep six paces to the front; and impressively informed him that if he were attacked from any quarter, he would move the finger pressing against the trigger of the pistol still pointed at his head. For the first time in his life the guide brought his charge in safety to the village across the mountains. For this he demanded extra compensation, and the Alcalde sustained the demand.

I have said that my uncle was a soldier. For all that, being also a philosopher, he preferred diplomacy to war. He had made his entry under unfavourable circumstances. He had been convicted of defrauding a poor robber of his dues. He was an object of suspicion; it was necessary to remove that suspicion.

He informed the Alcalde that he was more learned than the Chief Justice of Salamanca. He informed the Alcalde's fat daughter that she was more beautiful than the fair Florinda of Centa! Neither had ever heard of the illustrious personages to whom they were compared, but the compliment told the same. He represented to the priest that he had been sent by the Cardinal Archbishop of England, who had heard of the piety of the people of the valley and the grace and eloquence of their pastor, with a quantity of treasure for the repair of the church.

Indeed, that his only objection to being robbed had been on account of the loss to religion. His fine was remitted, and the sacrilegious guide driven from the village.

My uncle, happier than the Jew, had no faith to deny; he could, therefore, assume that of the people among whom he found himself, without compunction. He did not even deny his birthplace. He merely represented that England was the principal quarter of Rome, which everybody knew to be the seat of the true religion and a province of Spain. As soon as etiquette would allow, he inquired for the ruins of Ben Seid. Nobody had ever heard of them! My uncle had learnt experience that ruins as well as prophets are not held in honour in their own neighbourhood. He, therefore, engaged the housekeeper's best room at double price, and prepared to discover the Moorish Castle for himself.

It is necessary to go to church. Mass was said too early; he therefore attended vespers. Kneeling in the centre of the church was a lady in a black mantilla. Her form was graceful, her hair superb. My uncle passed along, and knelt beside her. She raised a hand, long and white, and put aside the veil which had concealed her features.

He was entranced. He had never seen such beauty in all his life. He was in love! He gazed upon her with rapture. She blushed and dropped her veil. When she left the place, he followed her. He came up with her at the outskirts of the village. He addressed her. He commenced: "Most beautiful, most adorable——" His foot slipped. He fell upon the ground. When he recovered she had disappeared.

He described her to his host; he did not know her. He described her to the Alcalde; he supposed she might be a gipsy from the mountains, and proposed to arrest her. He carelessly spoke of her, without dwelling on her beauty, to the Alcalde's daughter; she had never heard of her. He anxiously portrayed her to the priest; he had never seen her.

My uncle waited impatiently until the next evening. The lady did not appear. He attended every service for a week; he followed black mantillas, and peeped under long veils, until all the woman supposed him in love with them, and all the men were ready to poniard him. Still no lady.

He was in despair. He determined to fly from Spain and forget his love among the ruins of Tangier.

He hired a mule; he employed a guide; he was to leave the following morning.

Oppressed by baffled love and the smoke of villainous cigarettes, which his muleteer and guide were puffing in the cabaret, he went down the street until he came opposite the church; he crossed, entered, and walked up the aisle. Kneeling in the same place where he had seen her first was the lady of the black mantilla!

He picked his way cautiously among the prostrate worshippers until he came near her. At his approach she rose and left the building. Again he followed her. As he came up with her she quickened her pace. He kept beside her. She entered a dark mule path leading to the mountains. They came together into an open space where the moon shone full upon them. The lady stopped. My uncle stopped. She spoke; her voice was low and sweet, the exhalation of a generation of guitars. She said: "Why do you follow me, señor?"

"I love you," said he, "madly, passionately love you."

"It ill becomes a great soldier and a great hidalgo," said she, "to make sport of a poor unprotected lady."

"You know me?" said he.

"Who does not know," replied she, with enthusiasm, "the messenger of that most magnificent prelate, who, faithful to his trust, risked his most valuable life in the service of our holy religion?"

My uncle blushed. "But, alas!" continued she, "one may be brave in war and true to the faith, yet false in love."

"Not I!" exclaimed he. "I swear by all the saints that I am true—true in life, true in death!"

"And what would you have?" asked she.

"A word of hope!" exclaimed he; "a——" There came a loud halloo, and a clatter of hoofs down the path.

"Fly!" cried she in terror. "He is coming! He will slay you, he will slay us both!"

"Never!" said my uncle. "I am a soldier! I will protect and defend you."

"It is one against a host," whispered she; "if you love me, fly. Perhaps we may meet again!"

"Name the time and place," said he.

"Oh!" cried she, wringing her hands, "I cannot—I dare not!"

"I dare die with you!" said he firmly.

The jingle of spurs, the clash of swords, and the voices of men sounded close at hand.

"Fly!" cried she wildly; "or we both are undone!"

"Promise me——" began he.

"Anything," interrupted she, "only fly!"

"Meet me——"

"At the church of the Santa Dolorosa."

"When?"

"To-morrow, at midnight." And she glided away.

My uncle was in ecstasies. He was the happiest man in Spain. He returned home. The innkeeper presented his bill; it was extortionate, but my uncle paid it without a murmur. He dismissed the muleteer and guide, but not until he had paid them twice what they asked for conducting him on his journey. He retired, but not to sleep. He remembered that he did not know the situation of the place appointed for the meeting.

He rose at dawn. He paced the dirty courtyard an hour, waiting for the innkeeper to appear. He came at length, bearing some bundles of sticks.

"Where," demanded my uncle, "is the church of the Santa Dolorosa?"

The innkeeper dropped his faggots; he crossed himself; he called upon the Virgin; he ran crying into the house: "Here is a madman, inquiring for the Santa Dolorosa!"

The women set up a screaming, which raised the Alcalde, who lived next door. It raised the Alcalde's daughter, who screamed louder than the others on finding herself en déshabille under the gaze of the strange gentleman. Among them all they raised the village, men, women, dogs, and children.

It took an hour to explain that the strange gentleman wanted the Dolorosa. It took another to explain that nobody could tell why he shouldn't want her, except Manuel, the village orator.

It was still another hour before Manuel could be found. It was necessary for him to maintain his reputation. He seated himself upon the ground. His neighbours ranged themselves round. His voice was rich—his period magnificent. He narrated the history of Seville, and the exploits of Ferdinand and the Santa Isabella. He rehearsed innumerable legends, among them the following.

"At the time of the expulsion of the Moors'; there was a castle in the mountains of immense strength, and containing vast treasures. This castle was attacked by a great Christian captain, and taken, but not until its defenders were all slain.

"The victor, among other things, carried away the favourite slave of the infidel owner. She was of the most wondrous beauty, and her captain became greatly enamoured of her. Partly by force and partly by persuasion, he induced her to be baptised, and married her. She was not really converted, but in her heart still remained attached to her old faith, and true to the memory of her slain Moorish lord.

"The Christian captain had committed some sins in the course of his turbulent life which troubled him. He debated with himself whether to go on a pilgrimage or build a church. The former would take him from his wife, so he resolved upon the latter. The stones of the Moorish castle were at hand, and he owned the land by conquest. He therefore built his church among the infidel ruins.

"A church was nothing without a priest. He found the finest one in Seville, and installed him. The priest was young and without expression. He became smitten with his patron's wife. She encouraged him out of hatred to her husband and the true religion. The lord surprised them in the church. He slew them both, and their bodies fell across the altar. He fled, horror-struck, from the place of sacrilege, gave his estate to found a monastery, and went on a pilgrimage from which he never returned.

"The church of Santa Dolorosa went to ruin, but the site was still haunted by the Moorish lady and her paramour, the priest. She was still engaged in the ruin of true believers. She was accustomed to select a man who had rendered some signal service to the church, seduce him by her blandishments, entice him to the Santa Dolorosa, and there induce him to marry her.

"At the conclusion of the rites, performed by the recreant priest, the victim would be set upon by a horde of Moorish fiends, in waiting, and immediately torn in pieces. It was said that her power would continue until she should, by mistake, entangle in her toils an infidel like herself."

My uncle understood nothing of this harangue, except that the church of the Santa Dolorosa was the same as the castle of Ben Seid which he had come to find. He impatiently asked Manuel to conduct him thither. The saints forbade that the orator should know the situation of such a heathen nest. The saints forbade that anybody should know where it was.

My uncle was in a fury. He raved; he threatened; he entreated. The village was in a tumult. At length it was remembered that the shepherd Miguel had come across the church once in searching for his sheep.

Miguel thought he could find the place again. The distance was long; he must be well paid. My uncle expected to pay. It was also at the peril of his soul. My uncle was willing to pay for that, too. Then, the saints willing, he would set out the next day after to-morrow!

They set out, and travelled a long distance. It grew dark. Miguel declared he must return. His cattle were suffering for him. It was evident he dared not approach the Dolorosa by night. He gave my uncle directions for finding the ruins, which he said were but half a league distant, and left him.

My uncle had time to review the situation. He was in a strange part of a strange country. He was not certain but that his guide had misled him. It was possible that he was the victim of a plot. Perhaps he had been decoyed into this lonely place for the purpose of robbery or even murder. Perhaps his inamorata had—at the thought of her, his doubts forsook him. "She is beautiful!" said he. "She is good! She is true!"

He pressed on with alacrity in the direction pointed out by Miguel. His way lay up a ravine, where there flowed a mountain stream. The moon had risen, and threw strange shadows across his path from the rocks that lined the gorge. He shrank back to allow a long line of ghostly friars to pass him! He started at an apparition of armed men across his road!

"I am nervous," said he; and he took a copious draught from his hunting-flask. He walked forward, whistling the air of a wild song.

The time passed rapidly. He drew out his watch; it wanted a quarter to twelve! He must have come a league—nay, he must have come several leagues! He had lost his way! It was as safe to go forward as back. He drank again from his flask, and went on.

Directly he found himself on a small tongue of land, overhung by a dark mountain, and before him, beautiful in the moonlight, rose a group of palm-like Moorish columns. He paused, and for a moment, as he gazed on the stately pillars, their spandrels pierced in gossamer lace-work, the horseshoe-shaped corridors with their wealth, the mosaic decoration, and the gilded roof of Phœnician-like carpentry, starred as a heaven, though broken and defaced, still showing the gorgeous imagination of the Saracen, the exultation of the antiquary overcame every other emotion, and he felt that his toils and dangers were amply compensated by this view of the ruins of Ben Seid.

He was aroused from his contemplation by a rustle at his side, and, turning round, saw the beautiful lady of the black mantilla.

"There is no time to lose," whispered she; "the priest is waiting."

My uncle started. "What priest?" said he.

"Alas!" said she, bursting into tears; "I have thrown aside the delicacy of my sex at the promptings of love, and you despise me."

"What do you mean?" said my uncle.

"I have come," replied she, "to the church of Santa Dolorosa under the protection of a few old servants of my ruined house, and accompanied by a simple priest, who, for favours long since received, has remained my faithful friend, to be united according to the rites of our holy religion with the bravest soldier."

Her feelings overpowered her; she sank sobbing on the ground.

My uncle was in love. He was excited with brandy and the novelty of his situation. He had heard of the ardour of Spanish maidens. He seized the lady by the hand; he raised her up; he protested his devotion; he declared his willingness to follow her anywhere; to do anything she wished.

She conducted him to a part of the edifice in a better state of preservation than the rest and through an arched doorway into a large room only lighted by the moonbeams streaming through the crevices in the walls. At the upper end of this room he could distinguish a knot of persons, and among them the figure of a priest. As they advanced the room seemed filled with shadows wavering in the wind. Then came a sound of music, low and monotonous at first, but bursting out at length into a wild wail.

The lady paused and whispered: "Our marriage hymn."

The priest came forward and said, in a mournful voice: "My son, before entering upon this solemn undertaking, it is necessary that one should confess sins and receive absolution."

A sense of his position flashed across my uncle's mind. The deception in regard to his religion could be kept up no longer. He turned to his companion and said: "I was not educated in the Catholic faith; I am open to conviction; no doubt I shall come to see the truth."

"Who and what are you?" interrupted she in a hoarse whisper.

The shadowy forms grew but more distinct, and seemed pressing forward to hear his answer. The priest shook beneath his cowl!

"I am an Englishman," said my uncle; "I am of no religion."

The lady gave a wild shriek. The shadows were fierce, bearded men, their turbans tossing, and their scimitars flashing in the moonlight. The columns bowed; the building swayed; the floor seemed falling into an abyss.

When my uncle came to himself it was broad daylight. The sun was shining through the broken windows and the birds were singing their morning songs. He held something clasped in his hand. He looked down; it was the skeleton of a lady's hand! The fingers long and taper, and covered with rich jewels! He threw it from him with disgust. For the first time in his life he breathed a prayer. He rose and hurried from the place. He returned to the inn; he recalled his guide; he took his way to the nearest port, and left Spain for ever.

LUCIE'S REVENGE.

"Lucie, you are going too far; I tell you I will not have——"

"You will not!"

"You do not wait to hear what I am saying. Yes, I will not have this Englishman dance with you so often. People talk, Lucie. He only comes when you are here—only dances with you; and he looks—ah! how he looks!—as if he had only to command and you——"

Lucie crimsoned. "What do you know of how a gentleman should look? He admires me. He has taste," she replied with impudent frankness, that her pretty face and dainty figure fully justified. "And if he is handsome, am I, then, only to dance with the old and the ugly? 'He looks—ah! how he looks!'" she repeated mockingly. "Not on the ground" (Anatole raised his head and flushed), "but in my eyes, as a man should. He is not afraid to speak—to touch me, and so people talk and you are jealous. You are a fool."

She was so busy with the rose—already half dead—and Anatole's senses were so deadened by misery that neither heard the soft foot-fall that had approached the arbour, or saw the man who had paused before them. As Lucie ceased he spoke: "Our waltz, M'mselle."

They both looked up, and Anatole, seeing the suspicion of a smile on the clean-shaven face, wondered if the intruder had heard. Lucie, caring nothing, laughed, and smiled at him coquettishly as she took his proffered arm. The two men gazed curiously at each other for a second, and then, with the faintest of bows, the Englishman led his partner away into the ball-room.

Anatole remained, staring after them but seeing nothing. Ever since the evening his handsome rival had first seen Lucie at the Moulin Rouge, he feared for the result, and against the lover who is not bold Fate plays with loaded dice. He grew dull and self-conscious—doubtful of himself when most he needed to appear at advantage. So, very quickly his sweetheart became impatient, scornful, even ashamed of her lover, and every time they met the Englishman at the public ball-room Anatole seemed more his foil than ever.

It was useless to try and persuade Lucie not to go to the place again, the attempt would only have resulted in a shower of jests and ridicule more stinging than her sneers. Therefore he had been silent till now—and now he had quarrelled with her, and had seen her carried off in triumph.

At last he roused himself and, leaving the almost deserted grounds, entered the room and seated himself at one of the little tables to wait till the dancing was over.

The merry music, the swing of the dancers, the mirth, the glitter of light on gilding and glass, the gleam of white arms and shoulders—all that makes the Moulin Rouge attractive, merely mocked him, for he could see Lucie in the arms of his rival, laughing, chattering—and worse, listening.

He called for brandy; drank glass after glass. But it did not deaden the pain he felt; it only confused his senses, and made everything appear a hopeless tangle. The last dance drew to an end, and he made his way across to Lucie. She was standing with the Englishman, and he was looking down at her flushed face and laughing blue eyes with an air of possession that was maddening.

Anatole walked over to them slowly, for he knew the unusual drinking was taking effect.

"Lucie, you are coming home?" he asked.

She looked at his glazing eyes, and heavy, heated face with disgust, and then, glancing up at her partner, she met his scornful smile, and bit her lip.

"I am going home," she replied.

But the half-drunken man did not notice the intimation her answer conveyed.

"Come, then," he said, roughly pushing his way between her and the Englishman. But she drew to one side and turned to the latter.

"Will you give me your arm, monsieur?"

The white rose fell from her dress, unnoticed, except by Anatole, and as she passed out of the hall she left it lying in the dust of the floor.

That night she did not go home to her little apartment, and from that day she was seen no more at her usual place in the florist's in the Rue du Bac. Anatole was like a man insane; he could not work, but spent his days in the wine-shop, and his nights wandering about the streets when he was not sleeping off the effects of his drinking bouts. He rapidly went from bad to worse, as still no news came of Lucie or the Englishman.

Months passed, each spent in a series of mad orgies; his savings of years were gradually being spent to keep up the dreadful madness that deprived him of power to think of the past. It was killing him, quickly and surely.

One night he reached his lodgings in his usual condition, and, staggering up the stairs, threw open the door of his room and stumbled in. There was little light in the apartment, only the glimmer which came from the lamps below in the street. He threw his cap on the ground and lurched towards the bed.

"Anatole."

He swung round and grasped the bed-post to keep himself from falling. A woman's figure had risen from a chair and was standing facing him. For a moment he thought he had gone mad at last; that misery and his reckless attempts to drown it had turned his brain. It was Lucie. The shock sobered him somewhat.

"What are you doing here?" he cried, and though he strove to make his voice firm, there was an eager tremor in it.

"I have come back to you," she replied.

"And he——?"

"Has left me—is going to marry." And then she broke into a storm of fury and rage. "To marry—you hear? And he swore undying love to me and I believed him; and now—now. Oh! but I will be revenged on him, the traitor, the liar. To marry—left me—me—and I—I have come to you, for you will help me to my revenge."

"I? Do you forget the last night at the Moulin Rouge? I help you?"

"Yes—you. You drove me to it, Anatole, with your preaching and your jealousy and your drinking. But you hate this man—you must hate him."

She was right; her words had redoubled his hatred of the Englishman, and in his whirling, half-maddened brain were growing schemes of vengeance.

"You still love him," he cried hoarsely.

"Love! What has love to do with it," she replied fiercely. "And if I do? No, no, I hate him. I could see him dead at my feet and spurn him—so! Love! He has killed love!"

"And you want revenge. Listen; will you swear to marry me if I——"

"Yes, yes, if you——"

"Kill him."

"Kill! No—no," and she shrank back; "not that—not that."

"So you do love him?"

There was no answer, and he went on: "But you would be revenged. How, if he is not to die?"

"I do not know—frighten him—make him afraid to marry this girl."

Anatole laughed scornfully. "Frighten him! Is he a child then? Bah! a woman's plan—a foolish—but—but yes, why not, Santina? You remember last year how Santina killed the traitors to the 'Fils de l'Anarchie'?"

"Yes."

"Then why not——"

"Ah, yes, yes! That is it. But not to kill; you promise me? A glorious revenge—to make him suffer all the agonies of death, and still live to think of it."

Her eyes flashed. A true Parisian of the working class, she loved anything with a touch of melodrama in it—and would not this be dramatic?

Anatole saw in her vengeful, delighted face no love for him, but what did that matter? She would be his, and the thought after such months of despair, made his brain swim, and sent the blood rushing, hot, through his veins.

* * * *

Lucie was waiting in the Faubourg St. Martin, full of feverish impatience. Past four o'clock, and she saw no sign of the man whom she had come to meet. She was trembling with excitement. She made no attempt to analyse her feelings; had she done so, she would have found Love, Hate, and an instinct that evil would come of this plot, struggling in her breast, and producing emotions that were almost too great for her to bear.

Would he come? She hoped for, and yet dreaded his coming.

At length she turned back in the direction of the Boulevard de la Villette; she could bear the suspense no longer. But she had scarcely gone a dozen yards before she felt a light touch on her shoulder and the well-known English accent fell on her ear—"Lucie."

She turned with a start. "I could not be here sooner," said the Englishman hurriedly; "now what do you want? But we can't talk here, I—I may be seen," and a slight colour rose to his forehead.

The girl let the words pass unnoticed. "Will you come with me to my room?" she asked.

"Yes, but make haste."

She led him down the Rue Dunkerque, and through a multitude of little streets, dirty and dingy. "Where are you taking me?" he asked, as they traversed a narrow lane even filthier than the rest.

"To my apartment," she responded. "You shudder! Well, what can I do? I live where I can afford now."

"But I gave you money, Lucie."

"Yes, only when that is gone what shall I do? I must do as I can and be careful of what I have."

He made no further remark. At length they paused before a dingy hôtel meublé, and Lucie entered. The man stood for a moment hesitating and looking up at the dirty, broken lanterne, and at the wall of the house, trisected by two great cracks and covered with dirt over the whitewash. Then he lowered his eyes to Lucie, who stood waiting, and with a gesture of disgust followed her up the narrow, ill-lit stairs—up to the very garret. On the top landing she paused and looked down at him as he toiled up, breathing heavily with the unwonted exertion.

"You live near enough the sky," he grumbled.

She could not trust herself to reply, but opened the door of her room. At the top of the stairs the Englishman stopped to breathe and wipe his forehead. Every delay was agony to the girl, who stood nerving herself for the moment he should pass the doorway. At last he entered.

"Now, my girl, what is——" But the remaining words died away in a muffled murmur beneath the shawl Lucie flung over his head. He tried to free himself, but Anatole's strong arms were round him, forcing him down into a chair. He felt something tighten round his arms and shoulders. He struggled, but found his efforts useless, and he was compelled to sit quiet while the rope was knotted round him, and a rough gag thrust into his mouth.

Then they freed his head from the hot, suffocating folds of the shawl, and he gazed round. Lucie, pale, panting, half frightened, leant against the door, but opposite him, at the other side of the table, stood Anatole, with a malignant smile on his face.

"It is my turn now," he said. "Monsieur cannot have all the fortune. It is not always safe to take a man's sweetheart away and then cast her off. But yet it is a thousand pities; monsieur has a handsome face; eh?"

The girl's face clouded.

"It is almost a sin to disfigure it, and yet it must be so," Anatole continued.

He walked across to a cupboard, took out a small parcel, and opened it slowly on the table.

"Monsieur remembers the trial of Santina, guillotined for the murder of traitors to the anarchists?

"He does, I see, for he blanches and whitens. Santina's clocks were magnificent and this is one like them. See the little pistol muzzle just showing like a black hole in the face! That is all, and yet when the clock is set from that hole at the appointed hour comes a bullet and death to anyone in its path. See, I place it here. Alas! that handsome face. And now—at six! Monsieur has one hour—barely that—to live, and Lucie and I one hour to get away. We are going to be happy, Lucie and I, and the little 'ping' of the bullet will be our blessing. But fifty minutes now. It will soon be over, only—fifty minutes is a long time to look death in the face. The time passes much quicker at the Moulin Rouge. Come, Lucie."

The prisoner made a mute appeal with his eyes, and the girl paused, but Anatole caught her in his arms, and half carried her from the room. The door shut, the lock fastened with a snap, and the Englishman was left alone with the clock ticking away the remaining minutes.

Half-way down the stairs, Lucie paused, as if in doubt. "You are sure it is harmless?" she asked Anatole, looking into his face searchingly.

"There is nothing but the works in the clock, and a hole cut in the dial. What harm can come of that?"

Still she hesitated. Neither spoke, but both were wavering. Anatole roused himself with an effort.

"To-morrow he marries," he muttered.

Lucie turned as if stung, and resolutely began to descend the stairs.

"And to-night he shall suffer," she said.

A quarter—half-an-hour passed, and above there was silence. Three-quarters—and footsteps and hushed voices sounded from below, and came up the stairs. Lucie was trembling. Anatole as pale as she.

Three minutes to six—they paused outside the door and listened, heard a faint sound within of heavy breathing. Two minutes—one—a slight whizz, and then the little bell struck six. The listeners breathed a sigh of relief, and Anatole flung open the door.

The Englishman's head had fallen on his breast and was slightly moving. The heavy breathing has ceased. "He has fainted!" cried Anatole. "Some water, Lucie."

They bent over him and bathed his face and hands; there was no sign of consciousness. Tremblingly Anatole began to untie the ropes; they were tied tightly and he hurriedly took out his clasp knife and cut them. The body swayed to one side, leaning a dead weight on Lucie's shoulder, and she screamed at the touch. They raised it between them and laid it on the table in fear and dread. They clasped the hands and bathed the head again. At length they ceased. Lucie caught her breath with a gasp and instinctively Anatole crossed himself. With eyes of horror and mutual accusation, they stared at each other across the corpse. Lucie stooped and fearfully pressed her lips to the dead man's—they were still warm. It seemed as if he slept, and she kissed him again and again. Then she silently moved to the door. Anatole was standing in the way and she drew to one side that she might not touch him, and passed with a shudder.

He stood for a moment white as the dead body, his face set and haggard and his eyes dull and hopeless.

He looked down at the silent form on the table.

"All—all," he murmured; "her love—and still her love—her memory even—then this too," and he drew from the breast of his blouse a handful of faded, brown rose leaves, that had once been white, and scattering them in a little shower over the body, he turned and slowly left the apartment.

CHAPTER XXI.

TRIAL AND SENTENCE.

I LAY quite still when I awoke, looking up into the yet dim air with wondering eyes and a strange feeling of peace and restfulness. Nor could I, for a while, gather my senses to know where I was. Conscious only of calm and rest, I lay and looked up vaguely curious at the red shafts of light creeping over the edges of the walls of darkness that rose above in shadowy massiveness, at the few gaunt cedars that projected over the sky line, at the alternating redness and whiteness of the opposite cliff where the sun shone down, and at the birds of prey that circled overhead now and again swooping, with hoarse cry and rustle of wings, into the gulf below.

Gradually, as I gazed, the light grew stronger, revealing plainly the well-known chasm and throwing the shadows of its angles into deeper black by contrast, and gradually the remembrance of how and wherefore I was there dawned on me.

I started up, but a pain, sharp as a knife and heavy as a load of lead upon my back, caused me to lie down again with an involuntary moan. Something glittering by my side had caught my eyes in that brief space of time, and turning so that I could face it, though with great labour and agony, I saw my cherished sword, my "Sunderer," my mute but steadfast friend, my saviour in a dozen fights, the sharer in my measure of renown; and stretching out my hand I grasped its dear, familiar hilt, the touch seeming to put new life and new curiosity into me, new impatience to be up and doing.

"Ha! my voiceless comrade!" I said to the shining shaft of steel, "now thou art come back to me I feel that we shall yet do much together, as of old."

"Hist! he is awake! You shall speak to him first, Valdo," I heard a voice say, and then the speaker came between me and the daylight, and I saw my trusty follower standing near my feet.

"Art rested now?" asked Valdo, bending down.

"Yes, but cannot rise because of my wound," I answered. "Canst tell me how long I have slept?"

"Nigh on three days, Captain, and soundly, too, I'll swear, since we have dressed the cut in your back twice each day and thou didst not know it! But it seems thou hast found your famous sword."

"How came it here, after falling into the river?" I asked, my mind blundering over memory's dark places.

"Valdo brought it up for thee," said Atris, coming forward, "and the others held the rope he went down by and pulled him up again."

"Thou dost see, Captain, thou had'st done ill to part with us at any time," put in Valdo, "and we would fain thou promised to keep us in thy service ever."

"I promise you with all my heart," I said, looking at the brave, devoted couple. "Next to a woman's love is the love I bear you twain, and, please the gods, you shall ever be my comrades."

"Such friendship is better than a woman's love," growled Valdo, more, I think, to hide his feelings than for any other wish.

"Nay," said Atris, "thou hast never had an Izitla to cherish, or would talk otherwise."

"Go to!" the other answered. "And now, Captain," he said to me, "had we not better stay here till thy hurt is healed? It will cure slowly if thou hast rest, for nothing vital is injured—which is a marvel—and these cliff-dwellers, though barbarians, are a kindly race, and well-disposed to us."

"We will stay," I said, "though it goes against the grain to lie here on one's back when the Queen awaits my return with anxious eyes. Yet I will wait, for it will surely be the speediest in the end."

"Art wise," said Valdo; "but had thou not wished to stay I would have made thee, if I had to tie thee to a tree to do it!" with which gruff expression of goodwill on his part the pair retired to bring me food and drink.

I watched them walk away, and a misty moisture dimmed my eyes. Verily, I was favoured of the spirits in my manhood's prime to have given to me two such faithful friends and a sweetheart Queen; surely I should be recompensed now for the sorrows and sorrow-born sins of my youth. Surely the pattern of the Universe, that is woven in woe here and mirth there, in evil here and goodness there, in ways that pass our understanding, is too mazy a pattern for we mortals to follow out, or even to trace, though never so faintly, the shape of its boldest outlines?

Thirty days we stopped amongst those hospitable cliff-dwellers, sharing the shelter of their cedar-wood houses and their towns of solid masonry; seeing their hoards of treasure secreted in massive houses, built up to and into the rock, of large boulders laid firmly and squarely in sun-dried clay; eating the strange, sweet roots that grew in nooks and crannies on the face of the mighty cliffs; admiring their goodly store of richly coloured pottery, in the shaping of which these savages excel, and never ceasing to wonder at the cat-like ease and quickness with which these dusky dwellers in semi-darkness climbed up and down their frail ladders and rude footways, and ran along their dizzy paths where a slip meant death. And then, my wound being so far healed that I could walk, though still with difficulty, we said farewell to our generous friends, and taking the captive governor with us, set out on our long homeward journey.

Although we went more slowly than we came, we found it easier, since we knew our way without hesitation through the grim, iron-bound deserts of the land of ravines, over the level plain between it and the mountainous region, through that howling wilderness of snowy summits and frowning, craggy heights, and on till we came to the great chasm spanned by the tree-bridge, and where we had left 900 men.

They were still there, not having courage either to cross the barrier or to disobey my orders and retreat to the coast, but sorely tempted to do the latter, and on the point of mutiny against their officers.

Paying no heed to their troubles, or to their surprise at seeing us return with Quitzaal, I crossed the suspended trunks, Valdo and Atris coming next, bearing the governor, bound, between them, and the other twenty odd close behind, and making the passage without accident, gave the word to make tracks as swiftly as possible to the sea-shore. I began to long with a consuming desire to clasp my Briseis in my arms and claim my reward, now that I had fulfilled the task set and freed her realm from rebels and enemies.

Without delay we kept on until we came to the valley where the great battle had been fought, and passing by the huge brick pyramid—sole relic, like its former fellows scattered up and down the land, of four hundred years of Atlantian rule—we struck the path of our former march, and, following it, climbed out of the oval basin, across the tableland to the east, and thence descended the seaward slope, through all its gradations of climate from keenest winter to fiercest summer, until, emerging from the forest of the foot-hills, we came to the sandy shore, where the Ravager and a score of warships rode idly at anchor.

Orlanis and his sailors greeted us with ringing cheers of joy, for they had thought us lost and were on the verge of despair; and so, without ceremony, dragged us aboard, weighed anchors, and stood out for the eastward in a frenzy of delight. They longed, as I did, to once more reach Atlantis, and I smiled quietly to myself to see the marvellous skill and speed with which the homesick sailors shook out the fluttering sails and loosed the ropes and urged the rowers to their work and cleared the decks for any sort of weather.

And as I smiled I cheered them on, for my heart, too, was in their work, for every rippling wave we touched and overtook was a step nearer to our voyage end. But the Spirit of the Storm, who is one of the lesser gods, has neither care nor thought for human hopes or wishes, and caught our little fleet in a tempest ere we were a day out from the silent shores of Ulmeca.

It was not so strong a gale as I have known, but it blew as though it would never cease in one long roaring blast of wind and spray, coming always from the N.N.E., and keeping our deck swept clear of everything that was not lashed down, for a couple of weeks. The other ships scattered hither and thither before its fury, some foundering, others striving might and main to make headway against the hurricane, and others, like the Ravager, flying before it under bare spars and with rigid helm.

Of all the twenty vessels, only six besides my own got back to Atlantis, the others perishing in the storm.

Soon, as we sped onward under the mad impulse of the tempest's breath, we lost sight of all our consorts, and alone on the heaving sea the Ravager cut her way with daring eagerness through the pitching and tossing rollers that thundered ever in impotent fury in the front of her sharp-curved prow.

I stood by the helm, of all on board the least troubled, for the song of the sea was in my ears again, and recalled to me those careless, joyous pirate days, when, on the self-same staunch and sturdy craft, I had braved the rigor of a hundred gales, and, alone on the boundless blue, had laughed in the teeth of the fiercest storm that ever lashed the waters into reckless rage.

Yet two sennights of such storm-stress as this was not to my liking, and I welcomed as heartily as the others, when it came, the abating of the tempest and the clearing of the leaden-hued sky.

We had been borne back into the vast gulf of islands to the south of Ulmeca by then, and only managed to hoist a sail and get our ship under command again, when we sighted the dangerous rock that guards the landward passage.

It is a huge stone rising solitary from the water like a sentinel,* and round its stony base the sea lashes ever with a booming roar. As we drew near I noticed a clump of fig trees growing on the single strip of sand, and taking a boat I set off to bring a store of the fruit on board.

At first I gave up the attempt to land there, but finding no other spot where it was possible to get ashore, I made the venture, and though we had to creep on all fours through the boiling surf, where the reef ran into the sea, we at last reached the grove of green, wild fig-trees, and plucked a considerable quantity of the luscious fruit.

Wandering on through the grove, I found that it led up the high rock that towered above the water as high as the height of a hundred full-sized men, to a small cavern, wind-swept and bare, but said nothing of my discovery to the rest.

Then, conveying our loads with difficulty, we crept out to the boats, pulled back to the ship, and set her prow to the eastward, urging her forward by wind and oar as fast as both could hurry her, and, this time favoured by the elements, came duly in sight of the well-loved shores of Atlantis, having been absent for nigh upon a year.

Every soul on board the weather-beaten Ravager crowded on her deck at sight of the longed-for land, and right lustily they cheered as the well-known coast burst upon their view. Eagerly they signalled to the wondering people, who flocked to the shore as our ship glided past, and to the fisher-boats we overtook as we got nearer to the capital; and loud and strong rose the wild sweet notes of the Ina-Ana, as the Ravager, with Arnon the General at her helm, leading the chorus of the song, swept foaming through the waves into the Bay of Kronos, her oars beating the water with regular strokes, her sails spread full and taut, and the war-torn but triumphant flag of gold, with the sun of fire blazing on it, flying bravely from her mainmast top!

The Magnificent City was all a tumult on the instant we were sighted, and when we had got clear through the fleet of vessels in the harbour, and let down our anchors at the side of the stone pier, it was only by dint of stern appeals and lusty elbowings that we got foot on it, until a troop of soldiers came down and opened us a way to the palace, whither Valdo and Atris with myself and our prisoner repaired at once through the streets lined with the cheering populace.

Near the gates of the Royal abode we were met by Marenso and a company of the guard of honour, and by them ushered through the marble halls to the Audience Chamber, where the Queen awaited us on the Silver Throne amid a motley multitude of fawning courtiers and a bevy of fair ladies of rank and wealth.

Now I thought that the portals of the Gardens of Pleasure were once more open to me, as plaudits and shoutings arose on every hand and I was named by all as the saviour of my country and her greatest son, and most of all because my Briseis thanked me with her sweet, soft voice, giving me her royal hand to kiss before the concentrated gaze of that mighty throng.

"I had begun to fear for thy safety, Arnon," said she, "when Marenso returned without thee, and told of the scanty force left for pursuit of the rebel leader. But now thou art returned I am content."

"I came not because I had not then fulfilled my vow," I answered, looking into her dear face with gladdened eyes,

"and having now fulfilled it, here I am. Saving the Governor Quitzaal, whom I have here, and the Princess of Aidè, whom Marenso brought to thee, I know of no enemies to thy throne in all the land."

"Thou hast done well and nobly," the Queen replied, "and art worthy the boon thou once asked, which shall be nameless here. What seemeth best to thee that I do to these prisoners? for it were well that they be settled with at once, nor cause further trouble."

"In thy hands it rests, my Queen," I said, "though I would urge that the two be heard in their defence. For my part, I would not trust myself to judge."

"Bring in the Princess Listra," said Briseis, "and the rebel captives shall both be sentenced here, while this company is assembled. Thou, Arnon, and thy two officers, with Marenso and the priest Unim, take your place at my right hand. The culprits shall be put on the left. Hasten, varlets, and bring them forward!"

The soldiers advanced as desired, leading Quitzaal and the Princess—who had been kept in the palace since her arrival—to the foot of the throne on the left, and clearing a space round them with drawn swords. Neolyn, the guardian of the written law and the priest of the Spirit of Life, was the first to speak indicting the sullen twain.

He read the list of penalties that wait on those who defy the Sovereign and take up arms in treachery, and, concluding, said:

"And ye two who have added treachery to rebellion and stubbornness to both, who have sought to possess yourselves of the Queen's land and have wounded and slain her loyal subjects, who have caused the cities and towns of Atlantis to be laid in ruins, and have lost to her her province in the west; ye two are doomed to death by the sacred laws, unless the Sovereign who reigneth, after taking due counsel from the ministers of state, should otherwise decree. So runneth the writ."

The Queen would have spoken then, but the Princess, looking fair as ever she had done, and reckless withal, turned to her, disdainful and contemptuous.

"I ask no other decree, my fair, mild Queen, who hath not the heart of a sparrow, than that the writ be carried out," she said defiantly. "I have dared great things and I have lost, but I can die with a fearless face."

"Silence!" thundered Neolyn, "nor speak until thou art asked. The Queen shall say which of the prisoners shall speak first."

"I would hear Quitzaal, of whom I once thought better things," said Briseis.

"Then say on, captive," said the Priest of Life.

"I can only plead for the mercy of a merciful Queen," said Quitzaal, "for there is little excuse for my disloyalty. Yet I would ask one thing, if I may."

"Ask what thou wilt," granted Briseis.

"I would ask if thou, my sovereign, sent Vichri, thy cousin, to Ulmeca, with intent to put him in my place as governor, and send me home disgraced? For so he told me."

"'Twas a foul falsehood!" cried Briseis, her cheeks flushing with anger. "'Twas he I sent from here in disgrace because of his evilness to Arnon. But 'twas like him, who knew not how to do a good deed."

"Then that, in some part, must plead for me," said the ex-Governor; "for though I was hard pressed by the barbarians and might have gone over to them in rebellion, I had never, without Vichri's lying words, sent my fleets and armies into Atlantis, nor allowed the Prince of Aidè to raise his province in revolt. In so far as I am guilty let me be punished, but in so far as I was deceived let my sentence be mitigated. Thus much, O Queen, I entreat," and the tall, bearded man fell on his knees before the throne in supplication, though with a quiet dignity that became him well.

"What say you, my councillors?" asked Briseis.

"That 'tis not wise to show any leniency to so dangerous a man," returned Neolyn coldly.

"That 'twere a matter of great risk so to do," said I, "having regard to the future."

"Which I fear also," said Atris.

"I would say, consult thine own mind, Queen, and trust its promptings," urged Unim, "and rest assured that exile will be punishment enough."

"Let him die as the law injuncts," said Valdo gruffly, "and there will be an end of him."

"Take the lying words of Vichri into account, O Queen," said Marenso, "and fear not to be merciful."

"'Tis hard to judge from such contrary counsel," said Briseis, "but the Sleeper and Unim seem to me to speak the best, and, therefore, I sentence thee, Quitzaal, who was once the Governor of Ulmeca, to be exiled in that land, amongst its barbarians, for twenty years from this day, and if before that time thou dost set your foot on my shore, the law shall take its judgment on thee. Away! I will no thanks."

So the soldiers took him out amid murmurs of applause at the fair Queen's gentleness, and catching sight of his face as he went, I felt that there was no more to fear from him. Then Neolyn turned to the Princess Listra, asking if she had ought to say against the carrying out of the sentence upon herself.

"Naught!" she answered with a superb air of scorn, her eyes flashing and her figure drawn up to its full height. "Naught from she who has conquered. Kill me, mild and virtuous Queen, so that—as the gruff soldiers said of Quitzaal, the craven, the humble—there may be an end of me! Slay me as in thy heart of hearts thou longest, my rival, for having held thy love, thy Arnon, in my spell and made him forget thee. Slay me, I say, because my kisses have burned upon his faithless lips, my arms have clasped his stalwart form—him thou wouldst make thy king! Call me wanton, fickle, rebel, if thou wilt; 'tis the privilege of the victress, but forget not, you who hate me, yet long to hide thy hate and pose as mercy's self, forget not that thy Arnon thought me fairer by far than thee, and only left me for thy service because his grasping mind saw wealth and fame that way! Kill me here and now, I ask, and let there be an end of me, and take thy lover, whom I have cast off, and be happy if thou canst with my leavings!"

She stopped, and sank back at once into a calm, cold smile, unmoved by the cries of shame and anger that rang through the mighty chamber like the echo of a distant thunder-roll. As for Briseis, her colour deepened to a tinge of fire, then paled, then deepened again, and paled at last to the whiteness of alabaster under the scathing insult of the wanton's words, and I saw her shapely hand clasp the golden sceptre convulsively as the bitterness of the speech cut to her soul. I was roused to frenzy by the taunt, and, springing forward with "Sunderer" flashing in my hand, shouted in the fair, false face:

"Speak such foul words again in the Queen's hearing, leman, and this blade shall make thee dumb for ever!"

"I could wish a worse end than to fall by that famous sword, my lord," said she meekly, her whole manner changing now, and a strange light gleaming in those lustrous eyes that I liked not at all. "But it ill becomes thee to upbraid me for telling the truth."

I turned aside at that, and the Queen spoke.

"Think not to goad me into slaying thee, Listra," she said, "if for no other reason than because I would not have it said 'twas done for jealous revenge. Nor think that aught thou mayest say can turn me against my Arnon, whom I knew and loved before ever he saw thee, and who only fell a prey to thy evil wiles because Vichri, the traitor, led him to think me false.

"Before all my subjects I say this, Princess, fearing not that all know who is the man that my heart delighteth to honour. One have I loved and one only, and whatever his failings, at heart he has ever been true to me. By love I conquer thee, thou profligate and fallen, and thus do I bestow myself!" And stepping down the first step of the Silver Throne, my Briseis took my great, rough hand between her soft palms, and drawing me to her, placed it to her heart and held it there, looking into my eyes with triumphant love, whilst the great room rang with the admiring plaudits of the people.

I was proud that moment, and felt already a king, now that the Queen had publicly performed the ceremony that from time long past has been the sign of Royal betrothal in Atalantis. Then, gracefully disengaging my hand and remounting the steps, Briseis thus passed sentence on her chagrined enemy:

"And now, Listra, who will no longer be a Princess, but merely a fortuneless wanton, my decree is that thou goest forth from here safe and free, but an exile from Kronos and from what was once thy province. Lest any should lay hands on thee, I command that any who may strive to do thee hurt, equally with any who may aid thee in plots of revenge, shall die the death, and thyself, too, if you come before me a second time. Now lead her forth!"

One moment Listra's eyes blazed fire as she took a step forward, as though to attack the Queen, who thus repaid her evil with good, her spite with mercy, as I also started towards her, fearing danger, but on second thoughts her purpose changed, and she drew back, flushing with scorn.

"'Twere needless, lord," she said to me, "to keep guard over thy royal mate, thy mild, meek dove. I would not now injure her, for thy sake, but love her not too fondly, Macis, as thou valuest thy future happiness! I go, and thus, until we meet again, farewell!"

And gathering up her costly robes with an air of splendid hauteur that in that time of adversity became her well, the once powerful Princess went from the Audience Chamber, through the crowd that opened out to let her pass, in the midst of a great silence.

I breathed a sigh of relief when she had gone, as did the Queen, but Valdo muttered in my ear:

"My mind misgives me of this day's work. Methinks thy Queen will have need to repent of it some day."

"That is as it may befall," I said.

Then Unim, the Priest of Truth, spoke a few well-chosen words to the assembly, telling them that I was now betrothed, in the eyes of men and in the sight of the Spirits, to Briseis the Queen, and that after the customary fifty days of grace the nuptials and the coronation would be performed in the Temple of the Three Gods.

Thereupon up started certain high-placed nobles and distant kindred of the Queen, objecting to our union on the ground that I had been a pirate and was of low birth. To these I answered that, whatever my parentage might be and whatever my early life, I had not spared wealth or blood in fighting for Atlantis since, and that I held myself as noble as any who stood in that hall, and would ask the next who dared to cast a slur upon me to take it back at my sword's point.

At this they held their tongues, some craving my pardon—for bold words and defiant bearing are ever right ways to men's esteem—and then Briseis herself, with scarlet cheeks, stood up on the throne-step and said with simple grace, yet in clear and ringing tones: "The man whom I love shall be my king, nor shall I suffer any to speak a word against him." Thus were the grumblers' mouths effectually closed.

Then, with becoming modesty, the Queen withdrew to her own apartments, leaving Neolyn to read aloud the law relating to royal marriages, and Unim to invoke the blessing of the Spirits on our prospective union, amid the frantic approbations of the delighted audience, which afterwards slowly dispersed.

I then sought a bathe and a less warlike but more comfortable garb than I had worn on ship-board and on the battle-field, and that even sat down to meat with a gay company of nobles and captains in the great banquet-room of the palace. Marenso was there, with Valdo and Atris, on my right hand, Unim, Neolyn, and Orlanis on my left, and at the head of the feast-table I acted the genial host to the merry gathering.

It was a foretaste of my kinghood's duties, and flushed with my great good fortune and the devotion of my fair Briseis, to me the fairest daughter of man who has ever breathed the life-giving air, I could not well be other than overflowing with high good humour, rollicking jocularity, keen wit, and biting satire; with tales of daring, stories of peril, and episodes of love.

We had no ladies at our feast that night, and so the wine circled freely round the board as a swollen river through a dry and thirsty land, the slaves who waited on us knew not a moment's peace or rest for their weary feet, the costly, palate-tickling viands vanished as by magic before the onslaught of our ever-wagging jaws, and joke and repartee of none too straight a kind passed on from lip to lip 'mid bursts of light-won laughter.

And when the grey dawn crept into the room, paling the wasteful lamps and lighting up the dish-strewn table with its garish radiance, there were none of the guests who were not loth to rise, and did not loudly thank the gods for sending such a man to be their king.

CHAPTER XXII.

The Coronation.

Now for fifty days, according to the custom, I could not see my Briseis, nor be seen by her, so had to fill my time as best I might. In truth I had much to do during that period of probation in setting affairs of State to rights after the disorder consequent upon the war.

First I dispatched Quitzaal on a swift-sailing ship, under the charge of Orlanis, to the shores of Ulmeca, giving the officer orders to return as soon as possible.

Then I mustered the remnant of our once mighty fleet, and found to my sorrow that with warships, pirate craft, merchant vessels, slavers, and fishing barques, all told, I could only gather three hundred sail into the bay, and of these many were sorely battered, and most weakly manned. The latter deficiency was soon remedied, all hands being set to work to repair damages, and at the same time I summoned the most noted of the builders of ships to Kronos, commanding them to lay down the keels of two hundred new vessels, and have them ready for launching as soon as could be.

As I held out good wages, and the dockyards and building-sheds of the capital were the best in the country, the shipsmiths and their kindred craftsmen flocked to the city by hundreds, so that very soon the waterside resounded night and day with the noise of hammering and sawing and the clang of iron tools, was dotted for a great distance with skeleton fabrics and huge timber piles, and was lighted up after sunset with the glare of a hundred flaming fires.

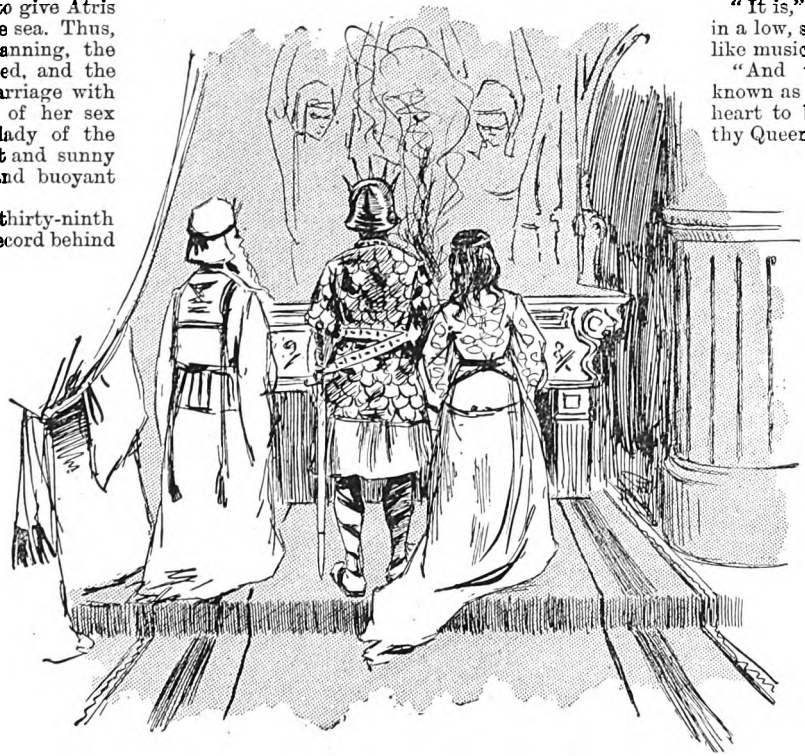
My authority to do all this I obtained from Briseis, her signet seal to all my orders being brought to me by Atris, who cared not how often he was sent to the palace so that he but caught glimpse of or spoke word with his love Izitla, the Queen's handmaid.

Another matter I settled was the disbandment of the greater portion of the army, and the forming of the remainder into a well-armed Royal Guard, officered by those who had borne themselves well in the war, and commanded by Valdo, who wanted nothing better. Marenso I promised to make my Chief Minister when I attained the throne, and it was in my mind to give Atris the command of the sea. Thus, with work and planning, the fifty days were sped, and the morning of my marriage with the fairest flower of her sex and the highest lady of the land dawned bright and sunny as my hopes, gay and buoyant as my heart.

I was in my thirty-ninth year then, with a record behind me that would suffice many men for a lifetime's doings, yet as I stood before the great altar of burnished bronze, whereon flamed the sacred fire that has never been quenched in the memory of man, with Briseis at my right and the three priests at my left, I could well have thought the past a vanished dream, and imagined that I stood on the threshold of a new existence, down whose long, dim vista I should ever wander, my love with me always, and the guardian spirits ever keeping watch and ward to shield us both from harm or sorrow.



I stood before the great altar of burnished bronze.

Alas! for mortal hope and dear day-dreaming, 'tis ever doomed to disappointment. And yet, when you stop to think the matter out more fully, is it not as well that now and then we should have these brighter visions in our common life? That here and there in the dark mysterious tracery of existence we should snatch a glimpse of pure and perfect love and sweet idyllic peace. Is it not as well, after all?

Well or ill, such gleam of bright illusion was mine that morning when Briseis, the Queen, was made my wife in the grand old temple of the Three Gods, the everlasting principles of Truth, and Life, and Love, nor did I strive against its sweet and subtle influence.

We stood there by the altar, with our hands interlocked, heedless of the worshippers who thronged within to get a sight of the ceremony, till Kalen, the priest of Love, bade us kneel before the marble statue of the three divinities which yet are one in essence and in soul.

Down we knelt in reverence, bowing our heads in unison to the masterpiece of sculpture. Then the priest threw sweet-smelling incense in the sacred flame, while others carried swinging censors down the pillared aisles of that great edifice, repeating to the people as they went passages from the Book of the Soul in slow, clear, earnest tones. Then Unim raised his hand for silence, and the murmuring of the vast multitude ceased like the sudden calming of a stormy sea, so that in the universal hush the lowest of his words was heard throughout the whole of the holy chamber.

"In the name of the Spirit of Truth," he said, "I command you both, who are here to be bound together in unchangeable ties, to give true answer to my questioning. Thou, Briseis, the Queen, say truly if it be thy will that the gods join thy life with that of Arnon, thy General?"

"It is," responded Briseis, in a low, sweet tone, that fell like music on my ear.

"And thou, Arnon, once known as Phrena, is it in thy heart to be truly wedded to thy Queen? Answer not without thought, for 'tis a great thing thou wouldst do."

"Natheless, I am resolved," I replied boldly.

"Then shall the wishes of you twain be fulfilled," said Unim. "Rise, O Queen, and rise, Arnon, that the Priest of Life may commend you to his brother Kalen."

We obeyed, and for the first time I gazed at the great concourse of people who crowded the pillared hall, and wedged themselves in all its nooks and corners, suffering from the heat and the pressure, but suffering uncomplainingly for curiosity's sake. Then Neolyn, taking us both by the hand, led us to Kalen, who stood near the eternal fire, and said:

"These, O Kalen, Priest of Love, are twain who would forsake the solitary paths they are pursuing, that they may henceforth walk together in one way, as one soul and one flesh. As two rivers, born on hills set far apart, and travelling many leagues of lonely distance, approach at last and merge into one great stream that is the sum of both and so continue till they reach the restless ocean, so these two would fain their lives did run, and being united, journey together as one from now until they reach that ocean whose name is Eternity."

"And have they answered the questions of Unim?" said Kalen gravely, with, nevertheless, a suggestive smile playing round the corners of his mouth, as was his wont.

"They have," answered Neolyn.

"Then their wishes shall be consummated," said Kalen, "and as the mountains soar to heaven, and the sunbeams shimmer on the sea, these two shall this day be made one."

He made a sign with his right hand, and instantly there floated on the air a soft, low melody, as of a choir of youthful voices singing afar off, their harmony mellowed by the distance and enriched by sweet-toned instruments lightly touched by deft fingers, yet distinct and clear, so that not a note was missed of the gentle song.

It rose by soft and slow degrees till I thought the singers were in the altar-room itself, but that I saw them not, and then as slowly sank again into the pleasing murmur of a spirit-song sung softly by a band of unseen singers far away. Fainter and fainter the melody trembled in our ears, dying, as it were, by imperceptible shades, until it went as a whisper through the sacred hall, and so ceased.

Then Kalen laid his hands upon us, one upon the Queen's shapely head, the other on my own raven-ringleted nob, and looking down at us with countenance most benign, thus spoke while the incense flame leapt fitfully in the brazen cup:

"In the name of the Spirit of Love I unite thee Briseis the Queen, with Arnon the General, who is from now the King, and declare you twain henceforward to be of one soul and one flesh, no more to be as two lives, but as one. The blessing of the Spirit of Love, which is the true blessing, shall rest on you all your days, saving only if ye thrust it from ye and cease to live in amity and joy.

"May happiness follow your footsteps as the day the night or the calm the storm; may your children be many, and a pride and a gladness to your hearts to your lives' end; may the pains and grief of the common lot pass you by with gentleness, and may the messenger whose summons none can refuse tarry long in his coming. May all who seek to harm you, to set your souls at variance, to cause you to break the bonds in which you are herewith bound be condemned to the death in this life, and to the desert of misery in the land of shadows, and may ill-fortune follow your enemies all their days.

"Thus blessed and guarded ye shall go forth from here, my children, man and wife, King and Queen of Atlantis, and see to it that you use well the power that is given to you by those who dwell for ever beyond our ken, but who will surely demand of every living soul an account of the deeds it hath done and the using of the faculties they have given it."

"Wife, I salute thee," I said to Briseis, as it is usual to speak on like occasions.

"Husband, I greet thee," answered she, and then, her sweet eyes full of love and joy and pride, she turned to the people, holding me by the hand, and said:

"My subjects, behold your King?"

And the vast assembly voiced their pleasure in one resounding roar of welcoming applause:

"The King! the King!"

Then I drew "Sunderer," flashing like a ray of light, from its polished sheath, and, holding it high over both our heads, I swore a full round oath, by all the spirits and lesser gods, that with this magic, far-famed blade I would cherish and defend my Queen and country against all foes whatever while its edge kept keen and life was in me.

At that another roar of wild acclaim uprose, in the midst of which I led my bride through a secret corridor that Neolyn had shown me the night before, to her gaily-decked cariole, which bore us swiftly through the streets to the Royal Palace, where the coronation ceremony must be performed.

Here a still greater congregation waited our approach in the Audience Chamber, into which I led my Queen with exultation, and in which I sat for the first time on the Silver Throne.

Who, seeing Arnon the Pirate, battling for his life with King Dulo's soldiers in the burning house of dead Miropis, an outlaw and a sea-robber, would have dared to think that one day the said outlaw would sit in the highest place in the land?

Nay, by Thoth and Amun, who would have believed it, seeing him in Sothi's power, or aboard the slaver barque swift sailing to the east, or as the leader of the refugees who fled from treacherous Ethiop, or as the captain of the wrecked Seamew, or even as the favoured love of the unfortunate Listra?

None but a man bereft of his senses, say you, and yet it all hath been thus, so mysteriously the Spirits weave the web of the world's destiny.

Some thoughts like these were passing through my mind, as I sat on the regal seat with Briseis, when Neolyn, who had followed us, came forward with the golden crown that Dulo had last worn, giving it to the Queen, who, when I knelt before her, placed it gently on my head.

It was a thick, plain gold circlet, with a rich round ruby of priceless value set in it, just over the forehead, and for all its worth and beauty and the power it implied I was right glad when the time came to lay it aside and rejoice in the free flowing locks that are ever the best headgear. My bride's crown was of a lighter make and with a smaller ruby, but of the same shape and pattern.

"Now," said Neolyn, when I sat once more upon the throne, with the golden symbol of majesty upon my brow, "now indeed we have a King once more in Atlantis, besides a Queen in her own right, and may the sun of happiness from now shine ever in our zenith, nor ever sink to slumber. 'Tis only needed now that thou, Arnon, take the vow on that thou dost hold most dear, and the day's requirements end. Speak well and clearly and with an honest heart, and as thou speakest so live and act. My work is done."

Then, rising amid a veritable storm of thunderous appraise, which calmed to a deep stillness when my lips opened, I took the vow of the Kings of Atlantis, with one hand holding "Sunderer" aloft, as I had done in the temple, and the other resting lightly on the Queen's shoulder.

"By the things which I hold dearest of all the things of earth," I cried, "I swear that naught shall make me faithless to the trust that I have this day taken up. By the Queen, my wife, my love, and by this famous sword, my steadfast friend, which two things in the order named are the two that I most dearly prize, I promise to guard and defend this land against all foes or traitors, within or without, to keep and enforce the laws, to oppress none, to nourish the weak and the suffering, to shield the priests and temples of the Spirits from all hurt, to make her cities great and noble, to reward her generals and captains who do great deeds, and in all things to seek her honour and glory. Thus I have sworn, and may the Spirits forsake me in the hour that I go back upon my vow."

With that I sat down again, and was king, indeed, and for the rest of my life.

Now the people pressed forward to do me homage—which ceremony I would gladly have escaped—and after them came all my friends, with whom I had more patience: Unim, the Priest of Truth, and his fellow-priest, Clisal; Kalen, the Priest of Love; Marenso, who had slept a thousand years; Neolyn; Orlanis, the captain of the dear old Ravager; Nayralm, the officer whom I helped to destroy Miropis; Valdo, my woman-hating follower; and, lastly, Atris—with his beloved Izitla and her aged father. All these I granted some boon in honour of the day, but none so willingly and joyfully as I granted the request of the last petitioners, that after another fifty days I would attend the marriage of my bride's waiting-maid with my trusty follower.

"'Twill be a joy second only to to-day's," I said to the blushing, sweet-faced maid, "to see my Atris so well bestowed. Only see to it that thou dost keep him not away from his duties too much. It is an easy thing to do!" They laughed, and, thanking me, went away happy.

Thus went the busy morn and noon and afternoon, nor till even did we gain a respite from the tiring whirl of pageant and festivity, which, spreading from the city outwards, thrilled through all the land in a ripple of gaiety and merrymaking.

'Twas good, indeed, to see the crowds of smiling faces everywhere, the smart displays of flags and bravery on every house, the floral arches thrown across the thronged streets, the rich festoons depending from the delicately-carved and finely-coloured capitols of massive columns, the streams of carioles that rattled down the stony wheelways of the roads, and the ample stores of food that, at my own expense, were served out with no niggard hands to the poorer classes.

'Twas better to hear the shouts of wild applause, the cries of joy and loyalty, that told of a people blessed with rightful rulers; to listen to the sounds of revelry, the songs of sweet-voiced singers, and the melodious clash of cymbals, rolling of drums, piping of flutes, and twanging of lyres, all merged and mellowed into festive harmony; 'twas better still to look across the bay at the fleet of three hundred sail and watch them as they fought a sham sea-battle, advancing, retreating, paying off and slewing round, chasing and grappling, till all the curving harbour was alive with mimic fight and motion. 'Twas even better still to note how well my lovely queen bore on her shoulders the burden of her fame and rank and wealth, being not too familiar with the nobles of high rank, reproving gently any courtly arrogance that came within her ken, speaking cherished words of praise to the brave and true, talking most to the humble and lowly without any false pride, and moving with matchless grace through all the day's bright scenes, a regal form of dark, deep loveliness, a type of purest and most beauteous womanhood; and 'twas best of all to see the many good, staunch friends around us who would serve us to the death and think they had but done their duty.

But 'twas when the wild rejoicings waned and the day had reached its end in a swiftly passing gloam of softened half-light that faded into star-lit darkness, and when Briseis and I retired from the gaze of our subjects, and sought the quiet of our own apartments, that the full fruition of our life's joy came to us.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The Sleeper's Story.

The world went very well with me then, and as King of Atlantis I lived for seventeen happy, peaceful years; the dearest and the gladdest of my life; brightened ever by the love of Briseis, which waned not, but grew from day to day, and cheered and comforted by the lisping prattle of infant voices, and later, by the merry shouts of children at their play—our children, two black, curly-haired, boisterous, boys, fond of mimic fighting with blunted wooden swords, the eldest and the youngest, with a dark, big-eyed girl between them, giving promise of a beauty witching as her lovely mother's.

These three we had, and these only, but dearer and sweeter were they in our eyes than anything else the world could give.

Didron, we named the eldest, fourteen years old, after the gruff old pirate who had taught me what I knew of sea-craft; "Little Didron," we called him, but in truth he was tall and sturdy as a young giant, and full of consequence withal.

Our daughter we named Vesta, after my fair Egyptian bride whom the sea had taken from me, so free and forgiving to her memory was my Queen; and the youngest, six years old, we named Alcis, in remembrance of the brave standard bearer who fell at my side in the great battle of Ulmeca. He was cast in a gentler mould than the other two, for where Didron was strong and hearty, and inclined to show his mastership when it was called in question, as I had done at his age, and where Vesta was very chary of her regal dignity, Alcis was of a more retiring nature, more considerate of others and simpler in his desires, and his girlish face, though it made him beloved of the Queen and the waiting-maids, often brought down upon him the jokes of his more robust brother, with whom, nevertheless, he could hold his own at skilful fence.

For myself, I loved them all equally, seeing that all cannot be alike and that all were my own.

Atris, also, was wedded to his Izitla, and their one child, their son, they named little Phrena, after the name I had once borne, and next to my own three children I loved the lad, who was as often in the palace as at his father's house—the house where Briseis had once lived and which Valdo now shared with his comrade Atris and the latter's wife and aged father, upon whose hoary head were evident the marks of nigh upon a hundred years.

The four youngsters played together as one family, though I noticed with pleasure, as they grew older, that Phrena chose out Vesta as his especial companion, and that the wayward minx was never so happy as when he chased her through the palace corridors for a merry kiss. I wished nothing better for them than that their youthful liking should grow up into later love, and it seemed to bring back to me my own young days when I had played with golden-haired Viol on the sandy beach of our isle in the sunny sea.

So calm were those seventeen years of joy, so little trouble was there to disturb my crown, that I began to think all danger past and to sink into a restful peace of mind, contented well with the sober records of a warless reign.

The sea had gained on the land but slowly since my coronation, so that the people were lulled into a false sense of secureness, and having made no effort to regain our lost colonies, no disturbing forces moved us from without. Yet though slowly, the sea still gained on the shore, and the absence of their wonted luxuries from abroad told hardly on the populace, so that the nobles were in great disfavour because of the hoards they treasured up and which they refused to share or sell.

Few pirates now rode the southern seas, for my fleet of five-hundred craft swept our coasts continually.

Of Listra I had not heard anything since the day she proudly went from the Queen's presence, an outcast from her rank and sex.

Thus most things gave promise of a long and quiet reign unruffled by the storm of human woe, so that in fancy I already saw myself a white-haired patriarch, dispensing justice from my throne with faltering voice and teaching young Didron to follow in my steps so that in worthiness he might assume my crown when I should need it no more; saw my Queen, my Briseis, my love, still beauteous in my eyes in spite of the added years, travelling by my side, a radiant form of comfort and of hope, adown the sloping hill of life to its peaceful end; saw Atris and Izitla bearing company with us in the inevitable pilgrimage, and their son and our daughter mated in true love bonds, and, perchance, their children—my grandchildren—cheering and enlivening our withered old age with their care-free chatter and innocent happiness; saw our friends, whom we had tried and trusted and not found wanting, traversing the self-same way, and one by one, as the Fates decreed, passing on into the Shadowland beyond.

I already saw the people, better skilled by then in the gentler arts and forgetful of the tricks of war, clustering fondly round my royal dignity, all loth that I should go, yet ready to bestow their loyalty upon my eldest son, and saw beyond the grave a long illustrious dynasty of kings sprung from myself, ruling wisely a great and prosperous nation, invincible within its borders and the mistress of the seas.

So soon had I forgotten the prophecy that was told of the Sleeper, so soon forgotten the words of Unim, the Priest of Truth. My fancy was a fancy only, nor was it long after the seventeen years had passed that my dream was shattered and my earlier fears fulfilled; not long till all the land was in a tumult, destined never to subside. Read on, and you shall be wise as I, though I pray to the gods that you may never be so sorrow-stricken and so sad.

It came about, as the time sped on, and the cares of state sat more easily upon me, that I found chance to indulge in sport and pastime, my chief companion in these pursuits being Marenso, who, of all pastimes, preferred fishing.

Sometimes a great retinue would accompany us; but show and pomp on like occasions I abhorred, and more often than not the Sleeper and I would steal surreptitiously from the palace, lines and nets in hand, and attended solely by one faithful servant, would seek an hour of quiet sport and conversation by the brink of some secluded stream, or in a quiet nook on the wooded shore. Little Alcis went with us now and then, delighting in the landing of the shining creatures, and clapping his hands in childish glee whenever a larger fish than usual darted past.

Many places we tried, but none so suited us as one near the shore, just a little to the N.E. of the bay. It was in a smaller bay, or inlet, that curved so sharply landwards, and was so narrow at its mouth that it seemed more like the estuary of a river than an arm of the sea. On the spit of land betwixt it and the ocean was a lovely dell, disposed in terraced ridges, and sprinkled over with an abundance of glorious flowers, the rich and blended perfumes of white-robed lilies, blush-red roses, and demurely-dressed deminons filling the redolent air.

It was a lovely spot, and there, one thrice-accursed day, Marenso and I were casting our hand-nets, while Alcis gambolled merrily under the shade of a giant aloe in full bloom, whose clustering pyramidal flowers rose grandly above the dark coronals of leaf. It was towards even, in the days when twilight lingers, and, looking seaward over the limitless expanse of billowy blue, the eye caught sight of several far-off specks of snowy sail, speeding homeward for the night, while, nearer, the birds were singing their evensongs with trill and chatter, and one precocious frog was disturbing the air with his dismal croaking.

We threw our nets and let out our lines, but all to no purpose. We could see the finny denizens of the inlet flashing hither and thither in the slanting shafts of light that trembled in the water, gathering round the tempting bait or hovering near the nets, but not one would rise to bite nor float into our traps.

We lost our patience at last, which fishermen do not often, and railed loudly at the obdurate creatures. Something in the atmosphere oppressed us also; it weighed heavy on our heads, and a strange opalescent yellowness hung over sea and land like a shadowy pall. The sky in the east looked leaden, and the very insects hummed in droning, listless tones about our ears.

"A storm is brewing, I will wager," said my comrade at length, dragging out his tackle in disgust, "and if so, 'tis of no avail to try to lure these little wretches from their element. Draw up thy lines and sit back here on this mossy bank, and we will talk, for a lazy, idle feeling has seized me."

"As it hath myself," I made reply, "and as it seemeth it hath these rebellious fishes, who obey not their king as loyal subjects ought! Of what shall we speak, Marenso?"

"If thou wouldst care to hear the story of my life before I fell asleep, which I have never yet told, I will talk of that," said he, "for I have a strong premonitory sense of coming evil that urges me to speak."

"Say on, my friend," I cried, taking Alcis on my knee and bidding him hearken to a tale that he would one day be proud of having listened to, "say on, nor think to weary me, for there is an hour of day as yet, and 'tis a thing I have often wished to know, though I have forborne to ask."

"It is not a long story, though it covers forty years," said the Sleeper, "but 'tis a curious one. King Monteza had just assumed the crown when I was born, and for the first thirty years of his reign knew not a day's relief from struggling with the hostile forces of his two cousins, Alcalda and Nem. These two hated one another as the tiger hates the crocodile, but they hated their royal cousin more, and so fought in unison against him.

"You must know that Kronos here was not then built, and that the Royal Court was held in those days at Miropis, where also the Sacred Grotto was, in which I worshipped often. Also, where the sea now rolls, the land—a rich and fertile tract—extended many a league from what is now the shore. I have told you once of the Isle of Olives; it was a day's journey on horseback from Miropis to the seaport whence we sailed for it. But the Isle itself is now buried under the greedy waters.

"The rebel leaders occupied chiefly the provinces of Aidè, Yand, and Saitè, and the rival armies were evenly balanced, so that neither side could gain advantage for many years.

"With my twin brothers, Mattoni and Olasin, a year younger than myself, I grew up among the disloyalists, and as soon as we were strong and tall enough, we were put under arms, and went to the war in our father's company. Our mother wept bitterly the day we set forth, proud and excited, for the front, and would fain have kept us back at the last. But our father was a stern, gruff man, who laughed at women's fears and mocked at their weaknesses, and with a great oath he bade us march on and be like men, getting into his saddle and riding off without so much as a word of farewell to his wife.

"I shall never forget that day. Our house was near the frontier of the two countries—for so Atlantis was then known—and the tide of battle had rolled to within a day's march of it, so that when we joined our array at noon, the fight had begun. Long and severe was that fight, the issue hanging in the balance, finely drawn, till the very end. Backwards and forwards the red tide surged, now from our home, and now towards it, but ever flowing with blood and death.

"At even it was over, and our friends were flying for their lives across the plain, hotly pursued by the victorious soldiers of King Monteza. My father fell and received his death-wound in that mad retreat, and when I and my brothers returned to our home, hungry, ragged, and foot-sore, after many days, we found only a charred ruin, with the corpses of our mother and our faithful servants lying under the gaunt, grim wreck, slain by the enemy."

"'Tis a terrible hearing," said I, "but how came it that thou afterwards went over to the enemy? for you said to the Queen, after your awakening, that you had fallen asleep, Monteza's General."

"If you will have patience, King, you shall soon know," answered the Sleeper gravely, "and when thou hast heard, you will no longer marvel thereat. Of all men, I least could have fashioned the thought that one day I should make peace with the enemies of my father and mother, and least of all on that day when we three brothers stood by the blackened, ruined house, and swore with uplifted hands never to rest until the slayers of our mother were themselves slain and their friends defeated and brought to justice.

"The King's triumph was short-lived, and in the next long engagement we found ourselves in the ranks of the victorious, gaining glory and renown by our recklessness in the struggle and our eagerness in the pursuit, and thence-forward rose steadily in favour till we were made captains of brigades, and were known throughout the land as the Dauntless Brothers, inseparable either in victory or defeat.

"Now, tired of the long struggle, and jealous of each other, the quarrellings of the two claimants to the throne grew frequent, causing a division in our ranks, and setting our soldiers against their friends and comrades. This I regretted greatly, seeing that our division would be the enemy's advantage, but, with my brothers, was compelled to uphold Prince Nem, who was the more honourable of the two, and the more inclined to peace.

"At last the trouble came to a head at a banquet that was held after a defeat that should have been a triumph. We three were there, as well as the two leaders, and from the first I feared that blood would be shed before the feast was done. However, all went well till the wine passed round, when Alcalda, who was given to drink and like a tiger when full of it, began to growl at our ill-luck, and throw out dark hints as to where the blame should rest. Nem bore his insults in silence for awhile, or only answered in jest, but when his brother, enraged at his quietness, rose and hurled a drinking cup straight at his head, he sprang to his feet with a fierce oath, and at the sword's point dared Alcalda to repeat his words.

"Like an infuriated beast now, the other replied with his weapon, and the guests taking part, the room was at once full of strife and running with ruddy blood. Our side, chiefly owing to the efforts of our Dauntless Brothers, was rapidly gaining the mastery, when an old general, Balinin by name, rushed in and bade us cease.

"'Let our leaders fight out their own quarrel,' he said, wisely, 'and let whoever is the victor be our only chief.'

"His words pleased us, and holding down our blades, we stood and watched the two struggling in the death grip. It was a struggle long and severe, but in the end, much to my chagrin, Alcalda slew his rival, the temperate-minded Nem, and Alcalda we all acknowledged as our rightful King.

"We three, for our liking for Nem, were never in favour with the victor thereafter, and but for our vow we had gone over to Monteza's camp, as some others did. As it was, we served Alcalda faithfully, so that he had no excuse for turning against us openly.

"Thus matters stood with us for awhile, till one day, pursuing a band of the foe's foragers too far, we were taken in an ambuscade, surrounded, and captured, after a stern fight. In a few days we were brought to the King's presence—for our fame was well known in his camp—and put upon our trial.

"'And so you are the Dauntless Brothers?' said Monteza, eyeing us keenly; 'you are the three who have so often turned the tide of battle against me?'

"'We are, and are proud of it,' answered Olasin.

"'And why have you fought against me, instead of for me?' asked the King. 'Think you that your prince, who has slain his brother, would make a fitter ruler than myself?'

"'No, King,' replied Mattoni, who was the readiest of speech amongst us, 'no, King. But thy men killed our father in battle the first day that we bore arms at his side, and thy men also slew our mother and our servants, and burnt our house to the ground. For that we fight against thee, for that we have sworn to fight thee until our parent-slayers are themselves slain and their friends dishonoured.'

"'"Tis no wonder that ye are rebels,' said Monteza; 'and I cannot cast blame upon ye for it, though such evil deeds were never done with my wish.'

"Then he thought for awhile, resting his chin on his hands, saying at last:

"'Art aware that since Alcalda has made a practice of slaying all his prisoners, I have done the same, and that your lives are forfeited?'

"'To our sorrow, King,' said we: 'we know our Chief has done it, and make no appeal to thy mercy.'

"'Nevertheless,' said Monteza, 'promise me but one thing—namely, that if your vow should be accomplished, and your Chief should turn against you, you three will come and serve under my banner, and you shall go free from here and back to your friends.'

"Astonished beyond measure, we took counsel amongst ourselves, and through Mattoni promised, and, thanking the King, went back to Alcalda's camp rejoicing, giving out there that we had escaped by stratagem.

"We understood King Monteza's intentions better a few months later, when a great bullock waggon, full of human heads, and attended by a countryman, drove into our lines, and was emptied in front of our tent, to the amazement of the soldiers.

"'These are the heads of the slayers of the parents of the Dauntless Brother,' said the unarmed, rustic waggoner who brought them, 'and are sent by command of King Monteza, who bade me say that the generals who commanded the day the deed was done are now dishonoured and reduced to the lowest rank, so that the Dauntless Brothers have now no cause to fight against him.'

"'"Tis well,' said Mattoni to Olasin and I, 'but as yet Alcalda has not turned on us, and our promise can still remain a promise. As for these heads, let us get them buried, for now I have seen them even revenge has lost its charm.'

"'As it hath to me,' I answered.

"Now some of the soldiers would have taken the messenger captive, but I interfered, and saw that he was given a safe conduct to the frontier.

"For a day or two all went on as before, but it seems that certain of the soldiers, mean wretches without shame, went secretly to Alcalda and told him of the matter, repeating the royal message, and seeing a chance to vent his jealous hate upon us, the Rebel Chief sent a strong body of his most trusted men to seize us in the night. Our friends, however, were many, and the plot being revealed to us in time we managed to evade his myrmidons, and, seeking safety in flight, came to Monteza's camp and offered him our services."

"Thou couldst do little else, then," I said.

"So thought we," continued Marenso, "and right gladly our erstwhile enemy welcomed us, saying with a chuckle of conceit, that though he had spared our lives once, we had given them up to him of our own free will.

"Thereafter we fought with the soldiers of Monteza, gaining even greater fame than before, and because of our knowledge of Alcalda's weaknesses, leading our troops to victory after victory, till only the province of Yand was left to the rebels, wherein they were cooped up by our armies.

"By that time I alone was left a soldier amongst my brethren, for Mattoni, ever glib of tongue, had become the High Priest of Truth and well versed in all the ancient mysteries, while Olasin, slower of speech, but more cunning and fonder of his ease, became the King's chief minister.

"But in camp and on the battlefield 'twas I whom the King liked best and I whom he made his general, second only in authority to himself. 'Twas I who led his victorious armies in the last campaign, and who, after a pitched battle and a long, running fight, met and slew Alcalda in single combat, and so brought the war to an end and gave peace to Atlantis. 'Twas I who thus gave Monteza an undivided realm, seating him firmly on the throne."

"Then how came it that the King let thee sleep so long a slumber without effort to wake thee?" I said. "For surely thou wert too useful a subject to be lightly lost!"

"I am coming to that presently," he said, "for there was a woman at the root of my mishap, as I verily believe there is a woman at the root of all earthly troubles. Let me tell thee the story in my own way."

NOT HER WAY TOM ASHLUN.

A quaint cottage, standing alone in a little bit of broken hearts.

A young girl, friendless and relationless, lived accompanied by a large dog, and carrying a stout face turned towards the heat of the flames.

A man was fishing at the side of the bridge. He looked back at the figure seated at the fire. Then noticed that she hesitated, and came forward to the story of his love, and the eyes of the blind girl encountered a cabinet. She drew a key from her detail of that last meeting. The man poured out this woman who had waited five long years for his broken heart.

But this man was not as other men.

The man watched her with dog-like eyes, as she walked through the village, past the straggling row beneath her. She started back with a little cry, as he passed on, and the curtain dropped softly behind many things over the winter's fire.

The man dropped his hands to his side. Something moved about the room with easy grace. It was late that he knew so well.

In the dim light of the fire it was with difficulty but he placed the girl's trembling hand under his feet, and Wealth in his hands.

But the time soon came for the man to go away. Afterwards neither of them ever forgot the smallest last remnant of former days.

And a great love sprang up between them.

After that the man came often to see the blind girl placed her foot upon it, and a plank gave way a tiny cottage in a tiny village.

Blind! The man started at the word. It seemed eternal darkness. He did not say, "I am sorry," though fearing some unknown danger.

"Thank you," said the girl. "I am very grateful so that he hardly knew it himself. "I have come here alone, cared for only by her housekeeper, the girl's confidence returned. She stirred up the fire of a swift-flowing stream.

The man's teeth bit into his lip until the blood went away.

He came a step forward, and held out his arms.

Presently she rose to her feet, and crossing the sides of a room, the floors were covered with artisticness—the furniture was placed round the heavy carpets, there were no doors, and few stairs—Then, with a quick movement, she drew out the words softly to herself. Then, without turning her walking stick in her hand. She went down the garden, arranged within with a certain æsthetic bottle, containing a greenish liquid.

Now it has been said that men do not die of blind eyes.

He looked keenly into the girl's face, but she seemed to rise in his throat and hold him before he tore himself away.

Somehow, he had expected that her instinct would assist her. He led her carefully across.

Then a thought occurred to him. "I will test her room. He paused, with his hand on the curtain, and sat quite still in her chair, as though turned to that he made out the figure of the girl seated in a floor.

So, with her promises ringing in his ears, the man came.

One winter afternoon the girl went for a walk, country lanes, across the meadows, and through the woods, until she presently found herself at the side of cottages to that tiny one at the end of them all smiting him for what he had done, found the body and wrote on a sheet of paper:

"Who is it?"

"I go to find him."

The man thought it was indifference. Rather, a stopper, and placed the bottle to her lips.

Five years later he came back, with Fame at his pocket, and opening the door, brought out a little dog bounded on in front, and showed him the way.

A fragile bridge crossed to the other side. The low chair drawn up before it.

She passed her fingers over it, feeling it carefully.

When they came to the little cottage, the blind girl. They took long walks together, and talked of him."

He found everything as he had left it, when he worshipped him. Tell me, what of him? Is he well? Is he happy?"

What is time, when one faces eternity?

"He is dead. He is dead." The girl repeated the tongue-tied. Yet he longed to rush forward, and like to be alone."

"He is well," he replied slowly, "and happy, indeed, if her love is strong."

"Loved him," cried the girl, "I adored him; I seemed to brighten as she heard him.

Without a word, the man turned, and crossed the room to the writing table, took a pen in her hand, for the troubles of this world are now as nothing to the man.

"I have come," he said, and his voice was changed to you. I am blind."

The girl sat quite still when he had left her, her head: "I thank you for your news. Now, I would return!

The little clock on the mantlepiece struck hour after hour, but she did not heed it.

Then she felt on the wall until her hands impossible that one so young and fair should live in strong arm, and insisted on taking her home. The from one who loved you, and who thought that you once loved him."

The man, returning a little later, his heart into a cheerful blaze, and drew two chairs before it. take the girl in his arms, and kiss her on her dear, have told her that it was he. Instead:

If he had only known how perfect was the love of of the girl he loved lying cold and stiff upon the stone.

* * * * *

And that was the worst thought that ever came to him.

THE CHRISTMAS JEWELS.

Amid the vast stillness of the winter night there was a gleaming, like the dust of diamonds, whose particles sparkled into minute flames when the moonlight glanced athwart the snow, which seemed to sing beneath the tread of two passers-by, so crisp and frosty it was.

"Christel, oh, little Christel; dost thou feel how my love binds me fast to thee?" murmured a youth's voice, and handsome Jean took the hand of the maiden, whose red lips quivered as if in response to the glistening of her beautiful eyes.

With her slender fingers smoothing down a lock of fair hair that was in danger of straying into her eyes, the girl spoke as follows: "I think Rose will be at the réveillon (midnight repast), so let us hurry on. Dost thou know her lover has given her a gold cross and also a ring of gold with an agate setting? Last month my grandfather gave me a gold cross, too, but it is so small a one! What will he give me, I wonder, for a New Year's gift?"

Poor, handsome Jean pressed her hand, and swiftly, softly, bent down and imprinted a burning kiss upon it. But pretty Christel seemed not to notice what he had done, and sighingly continued: "Many, many jewels have great ladies. Is it not a fine thing, Jean, to be a great lady with jewels and gold—to be rich and beautiful, Jean, rich and beautiful!"

The poor fellow gazed with gloomy, yet yearning, love-gleaming glances upon her; for his love for her was no less timid than deep, no less helpless than ardent, and impressed upon him a look of sorrow. If riches had only been his, how he would have lavished them on the girl beside him!

They walked on in silence until, when the woodland grew sparse, a red, flickering light guided the guests to the midnight feast, and invited them to enter the house. There crackled and blazed the cheery hearth-fire; there the old folks talked in low, measured tones of things of the olden times; the young people sitting apart listening with tender respect and due attention, while a fatty smell from the buckwheat cakes, mingled with the sugary scent of mulled wine, permeated the thick steam that, rising, flattened itself out against the low ceiling.

Eleven o'clock struck in some distant church tower, and the first clang of a bell trembled athwart the clear out-of-door shadowiness. Christel, listening, turned towards her companion, and with tear-dimmed eyes whispered: "If we could only believe the old folks, Jean!"

"What dost thou mean, pretty Christel?"

"Dost thou not remember, Jean, the legend of the Brèche up yonder," and she pointed through the window to a lofty crag, coldly shining above the forest, "the legend of the rock that every Christmas eve is cleft asunder and remains thus apart whilst midnight completes its twelve strokes; the legend of yonder rock and its hidden treasures? Surely, Jean, thou canst not fail to remember? What if we venture up there, what if it all should be true, Jean?"

Incredulity was in her voice and eyes, yet she smiled so longingly that the youth said: "Let us go then, dearest maid. Let us discover if it indeed be true."

So, taking leave of the kind people assembled for the réveillon, they set forth once more, gaining faith with every forward step that led them towards the crag, as they both silently recalled the ancient story, handed down from sire to son for ages, of a castle that once reared upon that height its gloomy, terror-inspiring battlements and bade defiance to all the peaceful country side, until one night, along with its sacrilegious lord and his accursed wealth, it was on a sudden swallowed up by the yawning maw of the mountain.

Many a witness there had been, so said the old folk, of the prodigies occurring at the Brèche just at the hour when in universal joy the Christian world celebrates the birth of the Redeemer, and miracles are permitted to astonish and awe mankind. Had the great rock not been seen to open as a door turns on its hinges, letting one gaze into dark passages that suddenly shone with the subterranean splendour of the long-lost treasure, whose fabulous masses of flashing gold and scintillating heaps of precious stones, the harvest of woe and bloodshed, were for an instant revealed, to be as swiftly sealed fast within the mountain again until another twelve months had fled into the past?

At length Christel broke the silence by murmuring: "Oh, Jean! if it be true, if it really be true, shall we not, while the hour is striking, shall we not stoop down and lean forward and pick up a ring, a necklace? We'll be so quick, so quick—a ring, a necklace, a string of pearls, a diamond brooch! Only just think of it, Jean! Thou wilt try for me, wilt thou not, dear Jean?" she urged, again appealing to her lover.

"Yes," he answered, with burning eyes and firmly-pressed lips, "yes, my Christel, I will try. Come, let us walk faster! Come, my darling!"

She looked at him adoringly: "Oh, Jean, how kind thou art!" she murmured, and was about to proffer her lips for a kiss; but there came such a sadness into Jean's eyes that she felt a vague shame steal upon her and hinder her from doing more than give him her hand.

Turning aside from the road, they plunged into the snow beneath the ancient spruce trees, whose sleet-bearded branches bent earthwards protectingly and, as it were, warningly, seeming to be conscious of the mad errand whereon the young couple had set out, then amongst loose stones and rocks, that jutted towards the summit.

Immense masses of ice groaned and seemed ready to split beneath their footsteps as they crossed fissures of unknown depth; often they would slip and come near sliding down some precipitious slope. Jean even had to carry Christel in places, a task anything but disagreeable, if such danger had not constantly threatened them. She fretted lest they should arrive beyond the hour of midnight, and thus be too late for the acquisition of any of the beautiful fabulous things locked up within the mountain.

But the sky grew cloudy, veiling the moon and stars, while, like petals detached from the flowers in some enchanted garden, a few snowflakes fell slowly through the seemingly stirless air. The huge Brèche loomed threateningly above the spruce forest, and far, far below, the valley lay dimly white, like the ghost of a landscape. Some black, gnarled roots coiled snakelike at the base of the crag as they approached and joined divers jagged lumps of rock together in dismal union. Jean, setting his precious burden down, pointed to a spot where the rock appeared beneath a bluish layer of ice, and simply said: "It is here."

Then they both sat down upon a stone to await the mysterious scene at the midnight stroke. Shivering with cold and a little frightened, Christel drew close to Jean, ever keeping her eyes fixed on the bluish spot in the ice; while the youth again clasped her hand and endeavoured to let her feel silently how strong and willing he was to protect her. He did not watch the ice upon the rock; his eyes turned skywards to gaze on the moon, which, re-issuing from a cloud, appeared reddish as in an eclipse, and a few stars also came fresh into view athwart the mist and the sparsely-falling snowflakes.

Hark! Remote, muffled, like a voice from out the past, amid the vast stillness a prelusive tinkle ascends. The first stroke of the midnight hour sounds! The mystery must now, if ever, unfold itself. With fast-beating hearts, Jean and Christel rise to their feet, in silent expectancy awaiting the miracle, and both now riveting their eyes upon the ice-covered rock. The air still vibrates with the first stroke of midnight, when, as though smitten by the spear of some pagan deity, the rock is rent asunder, gaping wide almost at their very feet; while a deep, dark, cavernous passage appears, that gradually becomes luminous from the entrance of the outer semi-radiance, as well as from the increase of the mystic inner glimmering.

While Christel stretches out her hands eagerly towards the sparkling cavern, Jean, disdaining to make use of a ruined flight of steps leading sideward into the mountain, leaps down directly into the shining mass and is lost to view in its dazzling splendour; but the shock of his leap causes the gold to chink and knock together with a sound that makes sweetest music to the ear of the young girl who stands without, now feverish with anxiety also, lest the magic spectacle vanish ere she can profit thereby, and she shudders with apprehension as the third stroke of the twelve resounds, faint and far, from the distant valley.

Meanwhile, Jean, his feet bathed, so to speak, in the precious coruscations, stoops down and gathers handfuls of big gold discs linked together by tiny chains, and, after flinging them out of the cavern, he picks up a diadem with an open setting of imperial diamonds and emeralds blazing like white and green flies, intermixed with rubies whose tint is like snow touched by the rosy light of dawn, and with topaz radiantly yellow as the sunlight itself.

This crown of fabulous worth he likewise tosses out into the snow, so as to gather an armful of pearl necklaces beautiful beyond expression; costly girdles of amethysts, sapphires, and turquoises, polished, but uncut, and held in place by gold filagree; rosaries fit for a queen, wherein in every tenth bead is a garnet, round and glossy as little crimson gooseberries, and wherein the Paternoster is composed of black and white diamonds arranged alternately. Like Christel, Jean also grows anxious, but not for himself, as the strokes fall from the distant clock. At the tenth stroke, with arms full laden, he stands upright, and casts the rich burden at his fair companion's feet; then, clutching firmly the jagged edge of the rock, he draws himself together preparatory to making a spring upwards and outwards.

He can see Christel close beside the cavern entrance, kneeling in the snow, her blonde hair tossed by the wind that has begun to blow, and streaming back into the shadows. Her eyes laugh at him, despite their fervour and anxiety of expression, and seem to caress him with their fond, fervid gaze.

Hark! Another stroke of the clock! Jean is ready to leap out; but he hears the cry of her whom he loves, a cry that is like a supplication: "More, more!"

He paused and looks at Christel, and, with close-set lips, but a heart full of forgiveness, lets go his hold of the rock and plunges down again into the inexhaustible treasure. He snatches a ring, and holding it high, like a symbol of victory, flings it with its gold-encircled, great, blood-red Oriental ruby towards the girl, whose hand makes a movement to catch it. Suddenly the twelfth stroke echoes through the wind-stirred air. Quick! Oh, Jean! Quick, ere it be too late! But the last vibration had ceased.

Noiselessly, even as it unclosed, does the rock shut to once more, and the snow begins to fall fast, its great white flakes dancing impishly round the maiden kneeling all alone with her eyes still fixed smilingly upon the glorious ruby, not yet realising the horror of her situation, not yet awakened to the thought of the brave, loyal lover, self-sacrificed to satisfy her thirst for wealth.

Two Jolly Girl Bachelors.

For several years they had worked together, lunched and dined and breakfasted together, shared one another's heart's secrets, and been inseparable companions. Men who knew the jolly girl bachelors called them ideal women. When one felt sad and heartsick and given over to the little moods that make a girl wretchedly, miserably woe-begone, the other was always there to comfort or laugh the tears away.

Flat Cosy, with its tiny corners filled with downy sofa cushions, was the resting place for more than one weary friend, who would drop in during the evenings for a cup of fragrant tea and a comfortable chat. The little brass tea kettle would hum a busy roundelay, and join in the argument as sturdily as if its fat little body contained a fairly good pair of lungs. Margaret was the elder of the two girls. She was always the same, good-natured, laughing Margaret.

Their men friends raved over Margaret's pretty face, but she sadly lacked the graceful, pretty ways that so soon disappear whan a girl enters the busy world of business. Her appearance was that of a well-informed, independent young woman, who was quite content with her masculine manner and airs of a girl bachelor.

As to Dorothy, the other girl—well, she wasn't what one would call a pretty girl. Her nose was a trifle too saucy, and her mouth could have been smaller. But she had wonderfully soft and fluffy hair that curled round her ears, and then piled itself in a silky knot on the top of her head. Her eyes were always bright, and were of that tender brown that one so seldom sees.

They were so unlike, those two girls, yet they drifted through life, each firm in her belief that no other girl lived who was quiet so unselfish, so sweetly dear, and so thoroughly good as her friend.

"We must be nice old spinisters, Margaret, dear," Dorothy used to say. "Or cross old maids, with cork-screw curls and plenty of cats and parrots, you know; because if you were to marry and leave me I'd die from loneliness, and I am sure you couldn't live without me."

"Indeed, I could not," Margaret would answer. "But I feel sure you will be the first to desert our little nest."

"How can you say such things?" and Dorothy's mouth would pucker up in a most melancholy manner.

Secrets were unknown to them. Love-letters were always read and commented on, and considered the rightful property of both girls. Simple Dorothy would dilate at great length over her love affairs, and many a glorious laugh did they both have when Jack Ryerson took it into his head to fall in love with her.

Jack was an artist. Not at all like the fascinating fellow in the story-books, who wears velvet coats and lives on biscuits and ale in a dusty and romantic studio, but a well-built man, who was employed in the art department of a commonplace publishing house.

"Sometimes I think that Dorothy isn't a real live girl at all," he once remarked to Margaret. "When she stood there in the doorway a moment ago, with her head tilted on one side and her hair looking so pretty, I couldn't help wondering if I were not actually looking at some old painting."

Dorothy was very fond of Jack. They used to have jolly times when she posed for his pictures, and, in fact, Jack Ryerson's sketches of pretty girls were unrivalled and the envy of all his fellow-workers. After each of their little sketching séances Dorothy would tell Margaret all about what Jack said, and how he said it, and what she said back. But one evening after Jack had gathered up his crayons and departed Dorothy marched off to her own room without the customary chat. Margaret was alarmed.

She brought out the mandoline, and sang several street ditties in the hopes that Dorothy would emerge from her den to have her ruffled spirits smoothed down. But no Dorothy appeared. It was after midnight, and Margaret had been asleep for some time when she was aroused by a white-robed figure that glided silently to her side, slid two very cold arms round her, and with a dismal little tremble sobbed:

"Maggy, darling, I'm so wretched and unhappy."

"Dorothy," Margaret gasped, "you'll catch your death; go back to bed at once and sleep. Do now, there's a dear."

"Sleep?" queried Dorothy. "I can't sleep. I haven't slept for a week. I got some powders from Dr. Hall to-day, and he said that I was nervous and tired out and needed rest; but he doesn't know anything. He——"

"Is it Jack, Dolly?" and Margaret looked into the fine brown eyes that shone in the moonlight.

"I don't know myself," Dorothy doubtfully replied, "but I presume it is. I feel as if I hadn't a friend in the world when he's not with me, and I'm too happy to breathe when he is here" (Margaret smiled just then), "and that's what makes me wild, and that's what makes me hate myself. He probably says all those pretty compliments to every woman he meets."

Things were never quite the same between them after that. Somehow Margaret seemed less sympathetic, and Dorothy felt that she was no longer interested in her foolish affairs. Jack and Dorothy began to find comfort in the silly little quarrels that only those who are in love indulge in.

At last, one day their argument ended most unfortunately, and although Jack wasn't really serious, Dorothy felt sure that he was, and was quite broken-hearted.

"You do make me so unhappy," she pouted. "I almost wish that you'd go and drown yourself, or hang yourself—do anything so that I'll never see you again. You keep me perfectly miserable all the time."

"Dolly! Sweetheart!" Jack pleaded. "Forgive me. I was only teasing you. I love you with all my heart!" Then, noticing her sneering smile, he said desperately: "but you don't believe it."

"No, I don't," Dorothy answered pettishly. "How many girls have you said that to? How far down on the list do I come? Really, now, but doesn't your conscience trouble you when you think of all the feminine hearts that you have broken? But I presume you have become hardened to it," and then Dorothy started up a series of hysterical bursts of merriment.

"Dorothy, I can't understand you," was all Jack said, and he slowly gathered together his scattered pencils, put them in his pockets, and departed without another word.

As he went out into the shadows of the street, he was half-inclined to rush back and entreat her to believe him. He did love her. To be sure, he had told other girls that he loved them, but his regard for them had never been just like the affection he had for Dorothy. He would give his life for that moody, tearful bit of femininity that he had left curled up in a big arm-chair. He kept saying to himself in an insane sort of fashion: "I love you, Dorothy, I love you." Then, when he found that he had wandered for miles with the chill air cutting his face and making his ears tingle, he laughed silently and said: "But I'll tease her. I'll pretend to make love to Margaret. By Jove! Why didn't I think of that before?"

A few days after that, Dorothy was missed from her desk at the office, and for the first time since the beginning of their friendship, Margaret lunched alone. During the long hours Dorothy wandered about the Flat Cosy, now plucking leaves from the geraniums in the window, now standing before the large mirror on the dressing-table, smoothing her white cheeks, brushing back the curls from her damp forehead, and studying her eyes that appeared to have grown suddenly larger.

But when Margaret went home that night Dorothy was quite like her old self. There was a bright spot on either cheek, and Margaret thought she had never seen Dorothy look sweeter. After dinner they sat before the fire, Dorothy with her head in Margaret's lap and Margaret's arms about her. They talked over every happy hour they had spent together. They laughed and even played childish games as they munched chocolates that Margaret said grew in her jacket-pockets. And when the time came to say good-night, and Dorothy kissed Margaret, as was her custom, Margaret puzzled over the tear that had fallen on her hand.

Dorothy had planned it all that afternoon. Three powders, Dr. Hall had said, would cause the death of a ten-year-old child, and she had all the powders that he had left with her—there were ten at least. He had cautioned her so carefully, for the medicine was very strong, and an overdose would surely prove fatal. Yes, she felt that she was wicked. Jack loved Margaret. He didn't love her, with the plain face and moody ways. It was Margaret. How could she have been so blind? He knew that she, Dorothy, loved him, so he said all those pretty things to comfort her.

She slipped into the pink eider-down that Jack so admired. She arranged her hair after the fashion that he professed to have liked best. Mechanically she folded and put away all the stray garments that were lying about the room. From her glove box she took a package that contained several folded bits of paper. Her gloves! They had never looked so pretty before. Her fan, too—but then Margaret could use it. How her temples throbbed! What made her choke so? Her heart seemed bursting with grief.

Oh, yes, she had forgotten. She must say her prayers—she had never neglected them—so she knelt down beside the white bed. For some reason she couldn't frame the words. She would get as far as "Thy kingdom come," and she would seem to forget and would mutter, "Dear old Jack! When I am dead you can marry Margaret and forget all about silly Dorothy. I would not love you if I could help it, and don't want you to love me because you are sorry for me."

At last she arose. How cramped her limbs were! There were the powders. Taking the cover of her porcelain powder-box, she emptied the contents of all the white papers in it. Her hands trembled when she raised it to her lips, but she grew strong, and in a moment was staring vacantly at the little cover, with its feathery coating of powder. The bed seemed so far away! She tottered towards it. How soft the pillows felt! She was so sleepy, too.

What sweet music she heard, and who had brought all the flowers that were floating through the air? There was an odour of jasmine. Jack was so fond of jasmine. Jack! Why, there was Jack! Dear Jack! He did love her after all. It was not Margaret at all. If she could only run her fingers through his hair, but somehow she could not move her hands. Ah! Jack came closer then. Yes, yes, it was really Jack. She felt his warm breath against her cheeks, but she could not see him any more. Everything was so black and dark. Jack's lips met hers. With a happy smile, she drifted into the mysterious "Valley of the Shadow."

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS

IN THE

TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

"Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one or two pounds daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an absolute success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, absolutely guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring judge. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For this information, we may say that on sending two penny stamps, a book entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of Medical and other journals (British and Foreign), and other interesting particulars, including the 'recipe,' can be had post free from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Extract from The Belfast News Letter.

No. 417.] [TWOPENCE.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

For the Week ending Dec. 26th, 1896.

Treasure Trove.

By JOHN K. LEYS.

Author of "The Tenth of June," etc., etc.

MR. PERCY ALGERNON GRIBBLE, junior invoice-clerk in the firm of Messrs. White, Spilliter and Co., of Little Britain, had changed his lodgings. Punctually at a quarter past six one October evening, Mr. Gribble left the office, and for the first time set out, not for the far-off wilds of Brixton, but for the more strictly Metropolitan neighbourhood of Pentonville.

The young man was very much like any other of a thousand young men in his class of life—better than some, not so good as others. He fancied that on the whole he was rather good-looking, the truth being that his short and stumpy figure, his colourless face, and commonplace features prevented even his most partial friends from considering him good-looking. But it was in the domain of intellect that Mr. Gribble conceived that his true claim to distinction lay. Ever since he could spell out of a child's toy-book he had been extremely fond of stories, and in later years he had been a ravenous devourer of the romances of M. Gaboriau, and his many English imitators. These tales had wrought in his brain very much as the tales of chivalry wrought in the brain of Don Quixote, of immortal memory, though not perhaps to so marked a degree. He longed to be the discoverer of the mystery. He could not refrain from haunting the scene of any notorious crime, and indulging in the delicious fancy that he was a detective engaged in unearthing the criminal, and in possession of a clue which was invisible to all eyes but his own.

He had even meditated applying for employment at the Criminal Investigation Department, but refrained, alleging to himself as a reason for not doing so, that so long as the Department was kept by a penurious government at its present level it really was not worthy of the attention of a gentleman.

The set of apartments which Mr. Gribble was about to occupy consisted of a small sitting-room, and a yet smaller bedroom which opened out of it. The furniture of both rooms was cheap and scanty; but opposite the fire in the sitting-room, with its back to the wall, stood an old-fashioned sofa of such generous size that the sight of it at once inclined Mr. Gribble to take the rooms, so that he might have the right of resting in the evening in its ample embrace. It was only horsehair, and entirely destitute of springs, but it was both long and deep, and Mr. Gribble sagely reflected that in a sofa no springs are better than broken ones. So the rooms were taken, very much on account of the promises made by the sofa; and on the first night of his residence in his new quarters, Mr. Gribble, having finished his evening meal, drew the table bearing the lamp up to the sofa, pulled out a novel that had been recommended to him as having a first-rate mystery in it, lighted a cigarette, and threw himself down upon the sofa with the intention of abandoning himself to the intellectual dissipation his soul loved.

Like most anticipated treats, however, the apples were not quite so good to the taste as they had seemed to the eye. The cigarette was of inferior flavour—the tale, like so many others, belied its title—the sofa was not only hard, but positively lumpy. Mr. Gribble dropped his book, and in spite of the unkindly nature of his couch, he presently fell asleep.

His sleep was uneasy, and disturbed by confused, nightmare-like dreams. The story he had been reading had been about a buried treasure, and this subject mixed itself up with fancies that must have come from recollections of the Arabian Nights. He thought he had reached the Valley of Diamonds, and was lying on a mound of large pebbles, which bruised his body all over; but some invisible power held him down to his stony bed, so that he could not rise

At length he awoke, and mechanically fell to rubbing his leg, which was positively paining him. He thought at first that this was merely the effect of his excited imagination, but on lying down again he found that the pain had been occasioned by one of the inequalities in his couch, which he had before noticed.

Surely, he thought, that might be remedied. The large horsehair cushion or mattress, which formed the upper surface of the sofa, was loose; and, thrusting his hand underneath it, he found that the inequality arose from a number of round, hard objects, not unlike the large pebbles of his dream.

Drawing one of them out, he saw at once that it was a jewel-case!

His amazement was unbounded. With trembling fingers he opened it—a magnificent diamond brooch lay before him!

It was with difficulty that he could repress a cry of astonishment. For a few seconds he gazed at it, his heart beating fast with excitement; and then he plunged his hand a second time beneath the sofa cushion. A curiously-shaped box was the first he fingered. He brought it out. It proved to be the case of a superb necklace of pearls. Without closing it he made another plunge into this extraordinary treasure-house, and his fingers had just closed upon another box, when——

"Tap—tap—tap!"

It was Mrs. Sparke, the landlady, come with his supper-tray.

Hastily catching up a newspaper, Gribble flung it over the open jewel-cases, and shouted: "Come in!"

Fortunately there was room enough on the table for the tray without disturbing the newspaper, which Mr. Gribble affected to be diligently reading. All the time the woman was in the room the young man was in a state of the most excruciating anxiety. He hardly dared trust himself to speak; and when he did answer a question his voice sounded so odd that it startled him to think what it must sound like to another. However, at last the good woman received her orders and went off. No sooner was she fairly out of the way, than Mr. Gribble locked his door, and set about his task in earnest.

He removed all the jewel-cases he could find under the sofa-cushion, opened them, and ranged them in order on the table.

Never was such a sight seen before in Pentonville.

The display was magnificent. There were rubies, emeralds, sapphires, and turquoises, as well as diamonds and pearls; and they set in every conceivable form of ornament—brooches, necklaces, and pendants—rings, earrings, and bracelets, with several trinkets of which the young man did not even know the name. He stood like one fascinated, unable to think clearly, his eyes dazzled by the sight of the gems, and his imagination bewildered by the thought of the wealth which they represented. It was not until he had compelled himself to close the cases and put them away in a black bag, which he daily carried to and from the city, that he recovered his mental balance. He then ate some bread and cheese, and, having finished his supper, he sat down to consider the matter.

Here certainly was a mystery. By what strange train of circumstances did these jewels come to be under the sofa cushion? To whom did they belong? Why had they been hidden there? What was he to do with them? Was it his duty to hand them over to Mrs. Sparke? Or to the police? Or set himself the task of discovering the true owner of the gems?

With regard to the first point, Mr. Gribble considered that the jewel-cases had probably lain under the sofa cushion for some time—it might be for years—and there was but one way, it seemed to him, of accounting for their presence where he had found them. They had been placed there hurriedly, and the owner, or the person in whose possession they had last been, had been prevented from returning to claim his property. He might have been killed by accident, or by design, or (more likely) he had been arrested, and the police had not succeeded in learning the place of his abode. This would explain the whole matter, and the young man came to the conclusion that this explanation must be the true one, for there could be no doubt that the treasure had been dishonestly come by. It was absurd to suppose that the true owner had secreted the jewels in such a place.

And Mr. Gribble told himself that a great deal turned upon that fact, for one cannot steal from a thief. The jewels seemed, in fact, to be of the nature of treasure-trove belonging by the law of Nature, if not by the law of human framing, to the first finder. On further consideration Mr. Gribble found no sufficient reason for surrendering his claim to anyone. It was tolerably certain that if he were to make his discovery public, many claimants would step forward—for it seemed most unlikely that so large and varied an assortment of jewels should belong to one person—and what security had he that the successful claimants would have any better right to the jewellery than he himself had? It was possible, certainly, that the treasure was the result of the robbery of a jeweller's shop; but Gribble was certain that there had been no robbery of such magnitude for a very long time.

With such arguments as those Mr. Gribble succeeded in stifling the voice of his conscience. He finally determined to look upon the jewels as his own, precisely as if he had found them on a desert island, and a thrill ran through his veins as he realised what this might mean to him. Wealth beyond what he had ever dreamt of possessing was already in his grasp. But there were certain dangers and difficulties to be met and overcome.

He must remember that although this treasure seemed to be derelict, it might not be so in reality, and that his appropriation of it might be attended with distinct peril. But this consideration, instead of weakening, only strengthened his resolution. He would match his wits against those of the clumsy London detectives, and beat them. He would dispose of the jewels secretly, one by one, in such a way as to baffle the keenest scent. In less than twelve months he would be a wealthy man, beyond the reach even of suspicion.

Having settled the main point, Mr. Gribble considered what his next steps ought to be, and then went to bed, taking care to carry the jewels into his bedroom, and to lock the door carefully before he lay down.

Next morning he put the bulk of the cases into his black bag, and the rest into his pockets. It was evident that he must return to these rooms no more, and this involved the loss of his trunk. That, however, Mr. Gribble told himself, was a small matter. His personal belongings would be enough to pay the small sum he owed to Mrs. Sparke—compared with the wealth he was now carrying about him it was not to be mentioned for a moment. One or two indispensable articles of clothing he disposed about his person, and went off to the City, looking as if he had gone marketing and had elected to carry his purchases home in his pockets.

Having reached the office without being challenged by the police, as he half expected to be, Gribble put his bag and overcoat away in a corner where they would not be noticed, and applied himself to his work with such an amount of attention as he could command. His plan was to go on quietly with his work at the office, seek out new rooms, and live in them in such a way as to occasion no remark for some time. Then, when his former landlady would have forgotten him and his abrupt desertion of her, he would begin the task of turning the jewels into cash.

He found suitable lodgings that night with no great difficulty, and the first thing he did after he settled down was to strip the stones of their settings, and secure them in a stout leather belt which, after a good deal of trouble, he succeeded in fabricating. This he wore round his waist; and if it caused him some inconvenience he consoled himself with the thought that he carried about with him continually that which placed him above the wants, the cares, and the anxieties of mankind.

As for the discarded cases, the disposing of them gave Mr. Gribble some anxious thought. One or two of them he threw away on waste pieces of land in the neighbourhood, but remembering that he could not throw away the eighteen remaining cases in this manner without running some risk, and that, at any rate, the plan was one which would never have commended itself to Lecoq, or any of his contemporaries, he made up the remaining cases with the gold settings in a parcel, which he weighted with a couple of bricks carried home in his black bag, and sank the bundle in the Thames by throwing it over one of the less frequented bridges at midnight. That done, he felt tolerably safe.

The shock was, therefore, all the greater, when, on being summoned one day to Mr. Spilliter's room, he found there, not the well-known figure of his employer, but a tall, hard-featured, military-looking man, dressed in a frock-coat buttoned up to the chin, and a young man about his own age, in a suit of tweeds of a telling pattern, on whose ingenuous countenance there rested a certain look of anxiety.

Gribble looked from one to the other, and said nothing. He knew he had grown very white, but that he could not help. He determined not to surrender the treasure if he could possibly avoid it. There was one point in his favour. Mr. Spilliter seemed to be out. It might be that if he succeeded in outwitting the detective his employer might never hear that the accusation had been made.

"I came to inquire," said the hard-featured man, "whether you lately stayed for one night—one night only—at the house of a Mrs. Sparke, 39, Caroline Street, Pentonville."

"What's that to you?" retorted Mr. Gribble. He was pleased with his own display of spirit; but the tall, hard-featured man only smiled.

"Come now," he said, "I see you're our man. And there are only the two ways of it—either you tell us all you know, and 'elp us all you can, or we'll have to make a criminal business of it, and then it won't be askin' questions of ye, but somethin' a vast deal worse to put up with. So take your choice, my young friend. But if you will be guided by me you will own up at once. What have ye done with 'em? Eh?"

Mr. Gribble gasped a little, for somehow he seemed to be choking, and moistened his lips. It was all so dreadfully prosaic, but at the same time so horribly real! What was he to do? The mirage of wealth which had haunted him ever since he had made his grand discovery faded from before his eyes. Concealment was no longer possible. He must give up the jewels and make the best terms he could.

"Do you represent the owners of this—this alleged property?" he asked, turning to the young man in tweeds, who had not yet spoken.

"I certainly do," said the young man firmly; "and what I say is, I can't see the need of all this palaver. Why can't you deliver up the goods at once, and be hanged to you? You ought to be prosecuted, and you may think yourself deuced lucky if we take the stuff and say no more about it."

Digitized by Google

Something in the young man's manner awakened Gribble's suspicions.

"You will have to prove your right to—to the property," he said.

"Oh, of course. Are you going to give up the things, or are you not?"

"I am," said Mr. Gribble, with dignity, "and all I stipulate for is that my claim to a reward—salvage, I may call it—should be fairly and dispassionately considered."

He left the room without noticing the stare with which this speech was received; and in a few minutes he returned, carrying in his hand the leather belt which he had made to keep the jewels in.

"There, gentlemen!" he exclaimed, laying the belt on the table with a smile of conscious rectitude, "I believe you will find the stones there without one exception."

So saying he raised one end of the belt and rained a shower of sparkling gems upon Mr. Spilliter's office table.

"What d'ye mean by that, you young rascal?" cried the hard-featured man, while the gentleman in tweeds sprang forward, and grasped the invoice-clerk by the collar.

"What's all this?" he shouted.

"The stones!" cried Gribble, twisting himself free—"the stones, you ungrateful hound!"

"To the mischief with your stones!" screamed the other, with one movement of his arm sweeping the glittering heap on to the floor—"I don't care a hang for the stones. They ain't stones—they're glass. What have you done with the gold settings—none of it less than nine-carat gold, and some of it as much as fifteen! What have you done with the gold settings and the cases, worth half-a-crown apiece at the very least—what have you done with them?"

"Those," said Mr. Gribble with quiet contempt, "are beyond your reach. You will have to seek them at the bottom of the Thames!"

"Shall I? By George, though, I'll make you pay for them!"

It was some time before the bewildered Mr. Gribble could be made to understand the facts of the case. When at length he understood that the priceless gems which he had appropriated were neither more nor less than specimens of sham jewellery made by a Birmingham firm for which Mrs. Sparke's eldest son acted as travelling salesman, he began to think that he had been greatly to blame in meddling with the matter at all.

And when he further learnt that young Mr. Sparke insisted that he should make up the value of the cases and the nine-carat gold settings by monthly payments, under the penalty of being denounced and prosecuted, his disgust was too deep for words. It took Mr. Gribble eighteen months to work off the debt, but it was a much longer time before his experience—the only one he ever had—of treasure-trove faded from his memory.

ONCE upon a time there was an old woman who had a niece, whom she had brought up very strictly, and who was a good, pious girl, but very timid and retiring. The old woman worried a good deal as to what should become of her niece when she herself was gone, and prayed God to send her a good husband. She made inquiries of a friend of hers who kept a boarding-house, and found that among her guests was a rich West Indian, who had announced that he would marry as soon as he could find a good, industrious, and clever girl.

The old woman sent him word that her niece was just what he wanted, that she was a prize, a grain of gold, and so clever that she could paint the birds in the air. The gentleman answered that he should be happy to make her acquaintance, and that he would come to see her next day. The old woman ran home, for she lived in a back street, and told her niece to put the house in order and to dress herself in her best the next day, for she was going to have a visitor. When the gentleman came the next morning he asked the girl if she knew how to spin.

"Why shouldn't she know how to spin?" answered the aunt. "She can spin a skein of thread while you are drinking a glass of water."

"What have you done, señora?" cried the niece after the gentleman had gone. "You know I cannot spin."

"Go ahead and try!" said the aunt, "and see what Providence will do for you."

"Ah, what a scrape you have got me into!" said the girl, weeping.

"Just wait," said the aunt, "we'll see how you'll get along; but you must spin these hanks, for the future depends on it."

The girl went to her room that night in great distress and began to pray to all the blessed souls in Paradise, for she was very pious.

While she was still on her knees, three beautiful spirits, dressed all in white, appeared to her and told her not to distress herself, for they would help her in return for the benefit which they had derived from her prayers, and each took a hank and, in a twinkling of an eye, spun it into thread as fine as a hair.

The next day, when the West Indian came, he was astonished at her skill and industry.

"Didn't I tell you, your Honour," said the old woman, full of delight.

The gentleman then asked the girl if she knew how to sew.

"Sew?" said the aunt. "Of course she knows how to sew. She'll finish a piece of sewing in the time it would take you to swallow a cherry at a bite."

Then the gentleman went away, leaving enough linen for three shirts, and the same thing happened as before, and again the next day, when he brought a satin waistcoat for her to embroider; only that night when the girl, with many tears, made a fervent appeal to the three blessed souls in Paradise, they appeared to her, and one of them said: "Do not worry, we will embroider this waistcoat for you, but on one condition."

"What is it?" asked the girl anxiously.

"You must invite us to your wedding."

"Am I going to be married?" asked the girl.

"Yes," answered the spirits, "to the rich West Indian."

And so it turned out, for when the gentleman saw the waistcoat so neatly embroidered that it looked as if hands could never have touched it, and fine enough to put your eye out, he told the aunt that he would like to marry her niece.

The aunt jumped for joy; not so the niece, who said to her:

"But, señora, what will become of me when my husband finds out that I don't know how to do anything?"

"Never mind, never mind!" said the aunt. "The blessed souls who have helped you so far will get you out of the difficulty."

So the wedding-day was fixed, and the night before the bride invited the blessed souls, according to agreement.

On the wedding-day, at the height of the festivities, three old women entered the hall, so bitterly ugly that everybody stared in amazement, and the bridegroom was dumfoundered. The first to enter had one very short arm and the other so long that it dragged on the ground. The second was hump-backed, and held her body all awry. The third had eyes more prominent than those of a conger eel, and redder than a tomato.

"Santa Maria!" said the groom to the bride. "Who are those three frights?"

"They are three aunts of my father's, whom I invited to my wedding," said the bride.

The señor, who believed her, went and spoke to them and offered them seats.

"Pray tell me," said he to the first old woman, "why have you a short arm and a long arm?"

"My son," answered the old woman, "it is because I have done so much spinning."

The bridegroom rose and went to his bride and said:

"Go at once and burn your wheel and your spindle, and never let me see you spin."

Then he asked the second old woman why she was hump-backed and all awry.

"My son," answered she, "because I have sat so much at the embroidery frame."

The gentleman went to his wife and said:

"Hurry up and burn your embroidery frame, and never let me see you embroider as long as you live."

Then he turned to the third old woman, and asked her why her eyes were so bulging and so red.

"My son," answered she, rolling them about in her head, "it is because I have sewed so much and bent my head over my work."

She had no sooner spoken these words than the bridegroom hastened to his wife's side and said:

"Collect your needles and thread and throw them down the well, and remember that the day I see you sew I will get a divorce." FERNAN CABELLERO.

I.

Mr. Christopher sat in front of his office fire nursing his left knee, his right leg stretched out to the fender, and in the corner of his mouth was an expensive cigar.

"Thirty thousand pounds," he murmured softly, almost caressingly. "Thirty thousand pounds! It is a great temptation, and, by Jove! it's business. Why should I give the fellow up to justice? If I wanted to, I could not prove that what I stated was true. After all, he is more sinned against than sinning, and besides, he has trusted me. It would be inhuman to put the law upon him."

Mr. Christopher took a paper from his pocket, a newspaper that had come from abroad, for part of the stamp adhered to it still.

"There's no mistake about it. Here it is in black and white. Five lakhs of rupees, thirty thousand pounds, to be made for twenty-five hundred down. If I don't do it, somebody else will. Of course I must do it."

Mr. Christopher blew a cloud of tobacco smoke into the face of the clock on the mantelpiece. A large number of letters were lying upon his table waiting to be attended to, but he could not give them his attention just now.

Presently there was a sharp tap at his door.

"Come in. What is it, Mr. Thomas?"

"A Mr. Smith to see you, sir. He says that his business is of a private nature."

"Show him in," said Mr. Christopher, and then he added to himself: "Private nature! I should think so."

There entered with great deference, as conscious of coming into the presence of such a considerable personage as the head of the largest firm of India merchants in the City of London, a tall, lank, hungry-looking individual. He had a wisp of grey hair under his chin, and his scanty eyebrows, which were permanently elevated, gave his keen, deep-set eyes a constant look of astonishment. His clothes, although scrupulously tidy, had seen better days; and his hands—long, thin hands they were—were clean and well cared for.

"Sit down, Mr. Smith, sit down. Let us come to business at once. I am a man of very few words."

Mr. Smith sat down on the extreme edge of an arm-chair, and placed his hat on the carpet beside him.

"You have decided then, Mr. Christopher?" he said slowly, with a drawl.

"I have."

"To buy?"

"To buy."

Mr. Smith took his handkerchief from his pocket, and dabbed first one eye and then the other.

"That is very good of you, Mr. Christopher," he said; "very good. I have put myself entirely in your hands, sir. I am not going back upon my word. I stole the jewel, I——"

"Sh! sh! I don't want to know that," interrupted Mr. Christopher.

"Of course not, but my position is a peculiar one. In justification to myself, I must tell you, Mr. Christopher, I am no ordinary thief. As you know, I was well known and respected abroad, and it was not until the blackguards robbed me of the means of getting my living that I sank low enough to be revenged by robbery."

"To business, Mr. Smith," said Mr. Christopher. "You told me all about that last night."

"Well, I—got possession of the stone, and I want to sell it. You can quite understand, Mr. Christopher, that so valuable a jewel in my possession looks suspicious"—he glanced down at his shabby garments as he spoke—"while in yours——"

"Just so," said Mr. Christopher.

"I am told the stone is worth twenty thousand pounds."

"Nonsense," said Mr. Christopher. "Let me look at it again."

The long man stood up, and from an inner pocket took a small box. He opened it carefully, and displayed to Mr. Christopher an enormous pigeon-blood ruby.

"It is supposed to be the only stone of the size and perfect colour in the world," said Mr. Smith.

In truth it was a wonderful gem, and Mr. Christopher's eyes sparkled as he looked at it.

"You are willing to hand this stone to me for two thousand five hundred pounds!"

"Yes," replied Mr. Smith slowly. "It is a sacrifice, but, under the circumstances, I cannot help it. I will not disguise from you the fact, Mr. Christopher, that you may find it difficult to dispose of."

"I will take my chance," was the answer.

"Of course it will be easier for you to do so than it would be for me. I should hardly sell at such a sacrifice otherwise."

Mr. Christopher smiled. Evidently Mr. Smith did not know that a reward had been offered for the jewel.

"There is one condition I make," said Mr. Smith.

Digitized by Google

"Well, what is it?"

"That you undertake not to deal with the stone, and not to speak of it to anybody for a month from this date. I have to think of myself, Mr. Christopher, and I want to entirely obliterate myself, so to speak, before anything is known about it. I was too well known in India to be careless even in England, and should you have occasion to give a description of the individual you got the stone from you might forget that he is tall and thin. My appearance is a somewhat marked one."

"This is purely a business transaction, Mr. Smith, as far as I am concerned," said Mr. Christopher. "It comes into my hands in the course of business, and I have no wish to remember how you became possessed of the stone, or, indeed, from whom I obtained it."

"I cannot part with it except under the condition I have mentioned," said Mr. Smith decidedly.

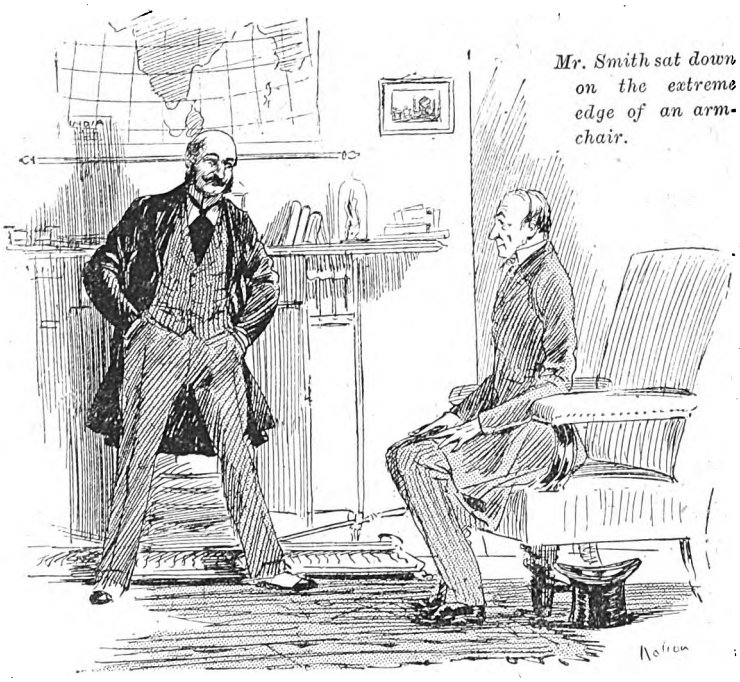
"I accept the condition, and undertake to forget you, my friend."

"You will not write, or telegraph, or talk about it. I do not intend to jeopardise my safety."

"I will not. I give you my word."

"Then give me your money," and a long, thin hand was extended.

Mr. Christopher opened his cheque book, and in exchange for the jewel gave Mr. Smith a cheque for two thousand five hundred pounds. Mr. Smith placed the box upon the desk, and, folding up the cheque, put it carefully in his pocket.



Mr. Smith sat down on the extreme edge of an arm-chair.

"Good-day, Mr. Christopher, and thank you."

"Good-day, Mr. Smith. Kindly remember that in future we are absolute strangers."

"I shall not forget."

And, still deferential, Mr. Smith bowed himself out.

Mr. Christopher was a man of his word. He had promised Mr. Smith to make no use of the jewel for a month, and he would as soon have thought of flying as breaking this promise. He locked the jewel in a drawer in his safe, but hardly a day passed that he did not take it from its hiding-place and feast his eyes upon it. A man who gives two thousand five hundred pounds for an article, no matter what its actual value may be, naturally looks upon his purchase as a treasure.

As a matter of fact, however, Mr. Christopher knew the value of the ruby—at least its sentimental value; would have known that it was worth a vast sum, even had he not seen the reward offered for it in the Indian paper. Perhaps Mr. Smith had overrated its intrinsic value when he mentioned twenty thousand pounds, but, at the same time, he was a man who ought to know.

Mr. Christopher had not been in India for some years now, but in the past he had been there a great deal, and few men knew the country better than he did, at any rate from a commercial point of view.

He was a practical man, had made a point of knowing personally the various countries his firm had business with, so that he was an exceedingly well-travelled man, a man of wide experience, and had an enormous amount of general and out-of-the-way knowledge in his head.

A few years ago his peregrinations had taken him into the State of Bhugerpore in Central India, and during his sojourn there he had laid the foundation of a very extensive trade for his firm, of which he was now the sole representative, and this trade had steadily increased ever since. The laying of this foundation had brought him in contact with many influential native merchants, and on more than one occasion with the Rajah of Bhugerpore himself, a potentate of considerable enlightenment, and as avaricious as he was enormously wealthy. The fame of his wealth was not confined to the State he ruled over, but had spread throughout India, and among his treasures nothing was more renowned than the great ruby the Rajah wore in his state turban, and which was known as "The Rajah's Eye."

Although the Rajah was enlightened, he had, in common with all Orientals, many superstitions, and was at one with his subjects in attaching great significance to this jewel. It was not only the emblem of sovereignty, but the pledge of the gods' protection; for ever since Bhugerpore was a State—and according to those who were supposed to know, its beginning must have been contemporaneous with the flood—it had adorned the head-dress of the ruler, and was commonly believed to shine more or less brilliantly as its wearer governed his people well or ill.

This jewel was at the present moment in Mr. Christopher's possession. It had been mysteriously removed from the turban, and the enormous reward of five lakhs of rupees had been offered for its recovery. Mr. Smith admitted that he had stolen it in revenge, and Mr. Christopher could quite understand that it had been a comparatively easy theft, since Mr. Smith had held an important position in the Rajah's palace. Mr. Smith's story of ill usuage might be a fabrication to condone the offence to some extent, but of the theft there was no doubt. Mr. Christopher had recognised the stone the moment he saw it. He had admired it many a time in Bhugerpore when the Rajah had passed on state occasions, and he had more than once stood close to the wearer of it, and talked with him, while the jewel sparkled at every movement of his head. It was indeed impossible to forget the stone, having once seen it. There was not its equal in the two hemispheres.

Mr. Christopher had a conscience, and it pricked him to some extent. There was no getting over the fact that he was the receiver of stolen property; still, property stolen from an Indian Rajah was hardly the same thing as property stolen from a fellow-countryman, who might possibly rub sleeves with you every day in the street.

"It makes all the difference," Mr. Christopher argued to himself; but whether he was convinced by his own argument or not, is a moot point. At any rate, he did not tell anybody, not even his wife, that "The Rajah's Eye" was in his keeping, or that in the near future he would receive about thirty thousand pounds for restoring it to the rightful owner.

During the month of silence which Mr. Smith had bargained for, Mr. Christopher was very hard at work early and late at his office. He had many things to arrange before going to India, for, of course, he was obliged to go to Bhugerpore himself. He could trust nobody with so delicate and important a mission.

Without uttering a falsehood, he was able to tell his wife that he was going abroad on business. It was business—business worth somewhere about twenty-seven thousand pounds after allowing for the money he had paid, the expense of the journey, and the loss by exchange.

Of course his clerks were curious, knowing of no transactions with Bhugerpore that made it necessary for the "Governor" to go there. Mr. Thomas, who had as much of Mr. Christopher's confidence as that gentleman ever gave to anyone, gave it as his opinion that the journey had something to do with that "long, lean Johnnie," as he was pleased to call Mr. Smith.

"The 'Governor' hasn't been himself since he came."

"More than that, I believe he gave the man a lot of money," said another.

"It wasn't business, then," said the cashier, "for no cheque has been drawn on the firm, except those I know all about."

Mr. Thomas had some reason for connecting his employer's journey with Mr. Smith's visit. He had twice chanced to go into the private room at the moment Mr. Christopher was locking the jewel away after inspecting it, and on both occasions Mr. Christopher had expressed annoyance at the interruption, and seemed rather confused. The clerk was surprised at such unusual behaviour, and not a little curious.

The stipulated month over, Mr. Christopher was ready to start. He did not intend to be away longer than he could help, so with as little luggage as possible, and with the jewel, which he had put in a small leather case, carefully concealed about his person, he joined the steamer at Suez.

He had been on deck about half-an-hour, when he was startled by a cheery voice behind him exclaiming:

"Hallo, Christopher! What in the name of all that's wonderful brings you in this part of the world?"

"Business," he answered, turning to shake hands with a fat, round individual, who looked the picture of self-complacency. Mr. Christopher was not pleased to see Mr. Fenwick of the firm of Fenwick, Gibbs and Co. It may have been professional prejudice, but he had always looked upon Mr. Fenwick as a man quite capable of underhand dealing.

"Business, eh! I thought you didn't go abroad much now?"

"I do not, but this time my business is too important to intrust to another person."

"Same here, exactly. I'm off to Bhugerpore as fast as this ship will carry me."

"Bhugerpore!"

"Yes—oh, your firm doesn't monopolise the trade there."

Mr. Christopher did not answer. He did not believe that Fenwick, Gibbs and Co. had much trade with Bhugerpore, in fact, was perfectly certain they had not. Why was Mr. Fenwick going there? And then he grew suspicious, especially as he could feel that his companion was watching him. Could Mr. Fenwick know anything about the theft of "The Rajah's Eye?" Could he have come out with the idea of blackmailing him, and sharing the reward? Could he in short know anything about the jewel at all? No. Perfectly absurd.

And yet—— Like a flash, the remembrance came to him of the two occasions his clerk Thomas had entered the room, just at the moment he was replacing the stone in the safe. Had Thomas caught sight of it by any chance, and sold the information to the rival firm?

"I am going to Bhugerpore too," said Mr. Christopher quietly.

Mr. Fenwick said he was very pleased, but somehow he did not look it.

II.

Very suspicious of his fellow traveller, confident that he was bent upon some underhand deal, Mr. Christopher was extremely careful of the jewel, and exceedingly cautious in his conversation. After watching Mr. Fenwick closely for two or three days, he came to the conclusion that Mr. Fenwick certainly knew of the stone, and that his intention was to get possession of it. No doubt the reward was a great temptation to such a man, and he would not be likely to stick at trifles. But how did he expect to get it? By robbery. It was the only way, for he was not likely to circumvent Mr. Christopher by any sharp practice he might attempt. Mr. Christopher was much too old a bird to be caught by the proverbial pinch of salt. His 'cuteness was well known, and it would require an abnormally early riser to find him asleep.

Mr. Christopher smiled as his hand pressed the small case which was sewn into his waistcoat. He wore that waistcoat always, even wore it under his pyjamas at night. Seeing how impossible it was for Mr. Fenwick to rob him, Mr. Christopher took an absolute delight in tempting him to try. He purposely left his cabin door open. He left his portmanteau unfastened and his things lying about; and, whenever he missed Mr. Fenwick for any length of time, crept down in the hope of catching him in the act.

However, Mr. Fenwick showed no disposition to rifle Mr. Christopher's luggage. He contented himself with watching Mr. Christopher as closely as that gentleman watched him. In the limited space of a mail steamer it was impossible to get far away from each other. Perforce they met at meals three times a day, and encountered each other whenever they promenaded the deck. The studied politeness with which they endeavoured to conceal their dislike for each other was a source of endless amusement to the other passengers.

On landing, circumstances obliged them to be closer companions still, as they made the journey from the coast into the interior to Bhugerpore together.

"Are you staying long?" Mr. Fenwick asked, as they neared the journey's end.

"A few days—and you?"

"Precisely my case," said Mr. Fenwick, and then he added casually, "I trust your enterprise will be successful."

Mr. Christopher smiled. It was too transparent an effort to draw him.

"I never take a step unless I am quite certain of my ground," he said.

"'Twixt cup and lip, there's many a slip," quoted his companion. "I can truthfully say my business causes me some anxiety."

"I have noticed that you have been somewhat excited ever since we left Suez."

"Merely my temperament," returned Mr. Fenwick quickly.

"Ah! I never get excited," said Mr. Christopher, with a superiority which was overwhelming. "A cool head is the only one for business. I built my firm on a cool head."

"Fenwick, Gibbs and Co. was founded by me, sir, has increased every year under my management, and I do not boast of a cool head. I fancy that knocks the bottom out of your argument."

Mr. Fenwick was much annoyed and did not refer to business again.

In Bhugerpore they separated.

"We may meet on our return journey," said Mr. Christopher, shaking hands.

"We may," was the curt answer, implying that it was most improbable.

Mr. Christopher accepted the hospitality of one of the richest merchants in Bhugerpore, and as he regarded the sumptuous luxury around him, he pitied poor Mr. Fenwick. Of course, the people he knew in Bhugerpore must be of a secondhand character. The merchants Mr. Christopher did not know were hardly worth knowing.

"You have come upon some great business, I presume, Mr. Christopher?" said his host.

"I have."

"May I know it?"

"First I must have an audience with the Rajah. My business affects him, in fact it has to do with everyone in Bhugerpore."

He spoke grandiloquently, and the merchant was duly impressed. His business relations with the Englishman in the past convinced him that he would not make such a statement without due warranty.

"It must be a very great business," he said thoughtfully; and he promised to secure an audience as soon as possible.

"You have had bad times in Bhugerpore, haven't you?" queried Mr. Christopher.

"Yes, rather bad, but I have known worse."

"I trust my coming will have the effect of bringing better times."

That night, Mr. Christopher took the jewel from his waistcoat to examine it and make sure it was secure. He experienced a little pang of fear every time he opened the case, fear that something might have happened to his treasure. It was perfectly safe, scintillating brilliantly.

Two days afterwards, the Rajah gave audience. The merchant told his guest that the potentate had been much out of temper lately, and hoped the business would tend to pacify him.

"It will," said Mr. Christopher confidently. He could quite understand the Rajah's anger.

It was a day of audience, and there was considerable excitement about the palace.

Cool man as he was, Mr. Christopher was guilty of a feeling of excitement when he thought of the change his mission would cause. He forgot all about the reward for the time being, in speculation of the general rejoicing that would follow his interview. If in England he attained no lasting honours, in Bhugerpore his name would certainly be handed down to posterity; some title even might be conferred upon him which he could use with advantage in the city and in Society at home.

He entered the palace, accompanied by two or three merchants, his friends, and, if there was excitement without, it was nothing to the excitement within. The audience had commenced, and in the outer court there was a regular Babel. The first person he set eyes upon was Mr. Fenwick, held tightly by soldiers, abject terror depicted in his face.

"For Heaven's sake, Christopher, speak for me!" and then the soldiers hurried him away, and would allow him to say no more.

Mr. Christopher was bewildered. Hardly understanding what he heard, he learnt that Mr. Fenwick's crime was the offering of a valueless stone as the great jewel of Bhugerpore which had been lost.

"Fool!" he muttered, as his hand closed over the case he had protected so long and carefully. "Fool!"

The next moment he passed into the presence of the Rajah. The dusky monarch looked exceedingly fierce, a man not to be trifled with at any time, and just now enraged at Mr. Fenwick's attempted fraud.

The friendly merchants trembled for Mr. Christopher, should his business prove to be of less importance than he deemed it.

Mr. Christopher stood still and was silent. He grew pale and his limbs shook, but not with fear. He was an Englishman, and a Rajah, however angry, was not likely to strike terror into him. In fact, he hardly noticed the Rajah. His gaze was fixed upon the turban, for there in the centre of it, scintillating with liquid fire, shone a jewel—the jewel—"The Rajah's Eye!"

Mr. Christopher, his fingers still closed tightly round the case he had treasured so assiduously, looked at the coruscating gem with a fascination which was not entirely free from superstition. How had it got there? For two months or more it had been in his possession, was in his possession only this morning when he had last looked at it, and yet——

There was no time to speculate, for the Rajah was waiting for him to approach; and collecting himself with a great effort Mr. Christopher saluted, and suggested that their interview should be more private. The Rajah motioned those about him to stand back a little, and while they did so Mr. Christopher had a moment or two for reflection. Then he poured into the Rajah's ears a long rigmarole about an extention of business which he contemplated with the State of Bhugerpore. It was all a fairy-tale, and the fluency with which the cool-headed Englishman unfolded his imaginary scheme spoke volumes for his inventive genius. The monarch was an avaricious man and listened attentively. Mr. Christopher had already done much for the trade of the State, why should he not do even more for it in the future.

"I leave it to your consideration," said the Englishman. "I have, as yet, spoken of it to no man, not even to your most illustrious subjects, who have traded with me in the past. I deemed it wise to consult with you first."

This pleased the Rajah greatly.

"Now may I congratulate your Highness, and speak of another matter, which is partly the reason of my presence here," continued Mr. Christopher, glancing at the turban. "We in England"—he spoke pompously, as if the destiny of England were under his immediate control—"we in England have heard that the glorious jewel, the pride and glory of your Highness, the 'Eye' that watches over all people in this great State of Bhugerpore, had been stolen, and that a large reward had been offered for it. I rejoice to see that it again gleams and sparkles above your august brow, to speak to all of your mightiness, and the stupendous antiquity of your race, which since time was has given rulers to Bhugerpore."

The Rajah's face clouded, remembering Mr. Fenwick.

"It has become known to me," Mr. Christopher went on, "that the reward has proved a great temptation to unscrupulous men, who intended to proclaim that they had found the jewel, whereas they have only possessed themselves of a copy, hoping thereby to deceive your Majesty, and to plunder your State of five lahks of rupees."

Then the Rajah burst out with all his native savagery.

"I know it—behold! This bauble was but now brought to me as the great 'Eye' of my forefathers, this worthless stone as the jewel that has crowned the brow of every Rajah of Bhugerpore, since Bhugerpore was. Fools! could I be deceived with such a thing as this, even if the jewel had not been found?"

He held the bauble out to Mr. Christopher, who looked at it, and then at the real jewel set in the turban.

"I have already seen two such stones, your Highness," said Mr. Christopher, for in his pocket he had an exact duplicate of the sham jewel. He had been deceived, there was no doubt of it. Seeing the great pink ruby blazing before him, the stone he had treasured so carefully appeared only a very poor imitation.

"Two!" exclaimed the Rajah.

"Yes, two," said Mr. Christopher; no one was more grieved at the sad depravity of man than he was just then. "And this has brought me to Bhugerpore, to warn your Highness. It is not only those whose hearts are open, and whose deeds can bear the light of day, who possess a smooth tongue and courteous manner. If there are two copies of the jewel, there may be more."

"I shall know how to deal with all such as bring them to me," said the Rajah, a grim smile puckering his dusky countenance. "This was brought by a countryman of yours, a frightened, fat little man."

"I would speak of him, your Highness." Mr. Christopher disliked Mr. Fenwick, but he understood the sacred obligations of an Englishman. "May I first inquire how the jewel came to be stolen?"

"It was all a mistake. It never was stolen. One day it was missing from the turban, and proclamation was made throughout the State, and the news spread through the country. But no; it was only lost. It had only become loose and slipped from its place, and the next day was found in the folds of my dress."

"When did all this occur?"

"Five months ago, or more. I remember, because another countryman of yours, one who was in much honour here, displeased me at that time, and soon afterwards left me. I suspected him of stealing the jewel, but in that I injured him. I had forgotten all about it until now, when this little, fat man comes to me with his lying. Were he one of my own people he should lie no more, but as it is he shall not escape punishment."

"I would speak of him, your Highness," said Mr. Christopher slowly, thinking more rapidly than he spoke; "I would entreat for him. He did not cause this trashy imitation to be made; he has not the ability to be so crafty. He was deceived, and, in his foolishness, imagined that he was bringing you the real jewel."

"Impossible!" exclaimed the Rajah.

"In Bhugerpore such foolishness may be impossible, but in England, although we have many wise men, we have also many fools. This little fat man is one of them and I beseech your Highness not to punish him too severely. Let him pay for his folly, and then I will take him away."

"Pay!"

"Certainly," said Mr. Christopher, still thinking very rapidly. "Should he pay half a lakh of rupees, would you consent to forgive him?"

"I would think of it," said the Rajah, his eyes sparkling.

"It will be difficult," said Mr. Christopher. "My countryman may prefer to suffer punishment rather than pay money. He is not at all a liberal man, your Highness."

"He must pay!" exclaimed the Rajah.

"Supposing he prefers to suffer punishment?"

"Make him pay, Mr. Christopher. He is a frightened little man. Make him afraid of what I will do to him."

"And if I succeed?"

The Rajah looked at Mr. Christopher, and that gentleman met his gaze steadily, and without giving the slightest clue to his thoughts on his affable features.

"I would think of it," said the Rajah, his eyes sparkling.

"What would you have?" asked the monarch, disappointed that such a question should have arisen.

"Twelve thousand rupees."

"Ah, no! It is too much."

"I shall have great difficulty to make my countryman pay at all."

The Rajah tried to beat Mr. Christopher down, but to no purpose, and at last he gave in. Mr. Christopher bowed low, and was then conducted to Mr. Fenwick. He assumed a grave aspect as he approached him, for he did not know how much of a coward Mr. Fenwick was.

"Well, Christopher, what has happened?"

"My dear Fenwick, you have terribly enraged the Rajah. Had I not come I cannot tell what might have happened. These Eastern potentates are vindictive, and although it is dangerous to take vengeance upon an Englishman, they sometimes forget the danger. The Rajah wants justice."

"Justice!"

"Sh! It is no time to argue. We are not in England, but in Bhugerpore, which I fear you know very imperfectly, Fenwick, or you would not have placed yourself in such a perilous position. The Rajah has spoken of death."

"The Rajah has spoken of death."

Mr. Fenwick's jaw fell, and his lips grew ashen. Mr. Christopher saw that the man was a coward.

"Death! Good heavens! what shall I do? Save me, Christopher. You know much more of this blackguardly country than I do."

"Fortunately, yes. Avarice is rampart in Bhugerpore. I have talked long and seriously with the Rajah, and only through his avarice can you hope to escape."

"He wants money!" Mr. Fenwick's pale face brightened.

"He does."

"How much?"

Mr. Christopher looked at him, almost a look of pity, and then said very deliberately:

"A lakh of rupees."

"A lakh! Did you say a lakh?"

Mr. Christopher nodded.

"A lakh! Why, that's six thousand pounds at least!"

"I am sorry, but they are terribly avaricious in Bhugerpore."

"Six thousand pounds!" repeated poor Mr. Fenwick. "I wouldn't give that sum for the life of any man in the world."

"It is your own life you have to consider just now. It is a long price to give for it, I know, but I suppose it is worth it to you. What answer am I to return to his Highness? If you pay the money, I have promised to get you out of the country as speedily as possible. To be quite plain, Fenwick, it is advisable that the Rajah should not see you again. He is so enraged that even his avarice might not save you."

"A lakh of rupees! How is it going to be done!"

The unfortunate man spread out his arms in despair, his face the picture of uncomfortable dismay.

"Come! Put a good face on your bad luck. It might be worse. Be thankful that the rate of exchange is as low as it is. Think of what a lakh of rupees would mean if the exchange were higher, and comfort yourself. You must arrange this payment somehow through me with a merchant here, for in a way I have become responsible for you. Should the amount be too great a draw upon the firm of Fenwick, Gibbs and Co., no doubt the firm of Christopher can manage a loan when we get back to London."

"I beg your pardon. Six thousand pounds will not break Fenwick, Gibbs and Co."

"I am glad to hear it. Where is the difficulty then?"

"Oh, pay the blackguard!" exclaimed Mr. Fenwick with an oath. "I shall make a Government matter of it when I get home. I'll have justice somehow."

With the utmost expedition the matter was arranged, the Rajah being delighted with his half a lakh of rupees, although he did make another vain attempt to get Mr. Christopher to lessen the amount of the commission, and that gentleman was equally pleased with the other half lakh, plus his twelve thousand rupees commission. It repaid him the money he had given to that scoundrel, Smith, and gave him a very handsome interest besides. Poor Mr. Fenwick! If he could only have known the meaning of Mr. Christopher's smile of pity!

Not until the shores of India had sunk below the horizon, did the unfortunate man breathe freely.

"Six thousand pounds is an awful price to pay for freedom," he said, as he stood watching the screw churn the blue ocean into foam.

"How did that trashy imitation come into your possession?" asked Mr. Christopher.

"This way. Of course, you have heard of a man named Smith, who had a rather important position in Bhugerpore."

"Yes."

"Well, he came to me with a tale of the many injuries he had suffered at the hands of the Rajah, that he had been nearly ruined, and in revenge had stolen 'The Rajah's Eye.' He showed me the jewel, and I recognised it at once, and knowing that the jewel had been stolen, and that a reward of five lakhs of rupees had been offered, I bought the stone for two thousand five hundred pounds. It was business. If I hadn't done so somebody else would."

"Hardly Fenwick, hardly. For a sham stone!"

"It was a wonderful copy. Did you see it?"

"I did. The Rajah showed it to me. It was a palpable imitation."

"I should like to get hold of Smith for half-an-hour," said Mr. Fenwick, his little body swelling with indignation. "He actually made the sale conditionally upon my keeping quiet about the jewel for a month. Of course, he wanted time to get out of the way. The scoundrel! He must have known of the loss of the stone."

"Oh, yes; he was in Bhugerpore at the time. The Rajah told me all about it. The fact is, Fenwick, you are too impetuous; your head is not cool enough for business."

"Don't jeer at me, Christopher." Mr. Fenwick was very humble. "How did your business succeed?"

"Fairly well; indeed, considering everything — very well."

"Christopher, you'll keep this quiet on 'Change, won't you?"

"I give you my word I will."

"Thank you."

"And I don't think I would make a Government affair of it, if I were you," Mr. Christopher said. "You see, receivers of stolen property are not treated very kindly, as a rule."

"Oh, but this was an exceptional case."

"Very exceptional, as far as you are concerned."

"Perhaps I had better leave it alone," Mr. Fenwick reflected. And he did. He was as silent as Mr. Christopher, who kept his word, and never mentioned a single item of the transaction, either on 'Change or anywhere else, with one exception.

On arriving in London, Mr. Christopher took the stone to an expert in Hatton Garden, who, to begin with, uttered an exclamation of surprise, but after careful examination, pronounced it a sham.

"It is a wonderful imitation—might deceive anybody," he said. "There is a method of manipulating rubies, Mr. Christopher. The surface of this is a very thin layer of a genuine, although inferior, stone, and the interior substance has been very cleverly worked. It is a long time since I have seen such a perfect fraud. I trust you have not been victimised."

"No. That stone is an exact copy of a very valuable jewel in India. I have just returned from there, and may say that I have had something to do with the discovery of the fraud."

"I hope your services were well rewarded."

"I am thankful to say that I did not lose money, which at one time I was in danger of doing."

Mr. Christopher paid into his account the half of Mr. Fenwick's ransom money, and the commission he had received from the Rajah. He sighed as he thought of that scoundrel Smith. Mr. Christopher had told him to remember that they were strangers for the future, and he did not expect Mr. Smith would forget.

"The scoundrel!" said Mr. Christopher, as he leant back in his office chair, and blew a tobacco cloud at the clock. "I was never so nearly robbed before. It is fortunate that Fenwick got first audience. The little deal has cost him between eight and nine thousand pounds, and I am something like a thousand pounds in pocket over the transaction. That is, at any rate, better than being robbed by Mr. Smith. There is nothing like a cool head for business. Poor Fenwick! No doubt he will stick to legitimate trading for the future."

Centuries and a Day.

A ROSE vine clung to the grey stone tower of an ancient castle. In the night, when the moon rose and the bleak highlands lay revealed by the pale light, the rose clung to the tower more closely still and shivered.

"I live but for a day," it said. "Why am I here at all?—Why?" And the anguish and terror of the little rose was intense, as it looked over at the black mountains and the deep, dark valleys, and felt the awfulness of this great world. But the breeze lulled it to rest, saying: "Never mind, sweet rose, there is a reason—sleep!"

When the sunshine flooded and the tower was warmed by its persistent rays, the little rose forgot its fears and would listen with rapture to the story the grey stones told of their life. Centuries and centuries they had lived—far back in the primeval ages. What had they not seen? Volcanoes, glaciers, mad, rushing torrents, earthquakes—centuries and centuries of wonders.

"We are made of consolidated sediments," said the stones. "Once we were soft, like sand, and some time in the far, far future, we will be decomposed again into the same. And so the cycle goes on and we will live for ever. We have seen the wonders of the earth unfold before us!"

The little rose marvelled at this strange existence. "And I live but for one day!" it moaned. "I shall never see these beautiful things!"

The rose envied the stones.

One day, from a window, just above the rose, a girl leaned. "It is the Princess," whispered the stones.

She leant farther, and the breeze fluttered her golden hair. She was even more beautiful than the rose. She stretched down her arm and plucked the flower.

"Good-bye!" said the stones. "Perhaps you may see some of this world's greatness."

The Princess gazed at the rose with a look of pleasure in her eyes that thrilled the flower. "If I give her happiness, but for a moment," it thought, "I have not lived in vain!"

The maiden leant against the casement. Her eyes turned from the rose. She was very still. The sun was sinking—a great ball of fire away off behind the mountains. There came a clatter of hoofs. The girl clasped her hands to her heart, almost crushing the little rose. But through her trembling white fingers it peeped, and saw a cavalier come riding by. He paused beneath the window, and looked up, resting his eyes upon the Princess—as only a lover can.

She looked down. In her eyes was a light so pure, so true. She threw him the rose. And so, quick as it fell, vanished its envy of the stones.

"Ho, ho! for your centuries of earth's wonders—your lofty mountains—your mad, passionate torrents! I have seen the revelation of love!"

So said the little rose, as it was carried away, and over the hills, pressed to a human heart.

THROUGH THE MULTITUDE OF BUSINESS

BY WINIFRED GRAHAM

Author of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," "Pauper Blue Blood," "On the Down Grade," etc., etc.

I.

"MEN are powerless to charm me," laughed Muriel Adeane. "I have been engaged to two, and I don't know which bored me most."

"And now?"

"Now I am free—thank Heaven!"

Miss Adeane was tall and handsome, with a rich olive skin, and eyes that were naturally bright and sparkling. A rather cruel little smile flickered round her mouth as she tore the leaves of a lily with restless fingers. Undoubtedly she was a splendid creature—a genuine "daughter of the gods"—but all too cold in her regal beauty, and so thought the man before her.

"Your flower!" she said, throwing it aside. "Flowers are dangerous things. They sometimes give away our secrets."

"We have no secrets to betray—you and I."

"Speak for yourself, Courtenay," she retorted. "I have no belief in your powers. You mesmerise poor fools who are weak enough to submit. You read thoughts—who could not look into my heart, or see one inch below the surface if you died for it. You have great influence over women! But I—I am not a woman."

"What then?"

"God knows! Half a sinner, and a little bit of an angel. I have never sued for forgiveness, and yet, in the eyes of some, I am higher than the stars."

"You do not believe I could curb your will—make you my slave—if I would?"

"Men are powerless to charm me."

"If you would!" she laughed. "What man would not? It is impossible, dear friend. So spare yourself the fruitless task of trying, and the still more aggravating fact of having failed."

"You know," he cried, "the intoxicating joy of success. To utter the very word 'failure' is like touching the sharp edge of a knife. 'Excess' is my motto; 'Success' my king."

"You are a strange man," she murmured softly, "and if you had not sworn to conquer me I might almost like you. Ernest Mitchell repeated your words at the club—told me about your bet. Your friends say you cannot win me in one month, and that I am going to marry Earl Pembroke—or his money—so I hear."

"Mitchell is a babbling cur! Why do you listen to him?"

"I don't listen. He talks to me, and sometimes I overhear. He has a sharp, penetrating voice, that hurts my head."

"It is twelve o'clock," he said, pointing to the time. "The first of the month."

The music, alluring and soft, stole from the ball-room, and wailed among the palms.

"Do you see that woman in the long black gown?" asked Muriel Adeane.

"The girl with hazel hair and a very white forehead?"

"Yes. She is beautiful. Her jewels are finer than mine."

"What of that?"

"Look!" pointing to the retreating figure. "How she is laughing! Her husband cut his throat at dinner, and they say she gets drunk every night."

"Grief is devoured in flames," he replied. "God made women weak."

"Finish the sentence. He trusted their defence to man's generosity."

"I will be generous, if you will be weak!"

Miss Adeane drew her skirts aside, with a deprecating gesture.

"What quaint witchcraft you practice! It is so obscurely veiled one cannot feel even a little fluttered or confused. Poor Courtenay!"

He looked straight into her eyes—so straight that she almost thought he had struck her. A strange, stunned feeling surged through her brain, and for the moment she was robbed of sight and sense. With a sudden inward fear she sprang to her feet, and then she laughed a soft, rippling peal, which broke from her lips to smother a cry.

"It is light outside," she said, turning to the window. "Why! The day has dawned!"

They glanced up and saw that the clock had stopped. It was still twelve.

"Let us go," said Muriel.

She led the way to the hall. The music was silent and though a few stray guests still lingered, the dance was over. Her chaperon stood cloaked in the doorway awaiting her charge.

Miss Adeane took in the situation at a glance.

"I feel honoured," whispered a voice in her ear, "that I have been able to detain you so long. It shows me I found favour after all." Again his piercing eyes were riveted upon her—and they seemed to burn and burn. "I am glad—most glad," he continued. "Have you not one word for me at parting?"

"You are cruel," she replied. "I think you're the sort of man who would ill-treat his animals."

All that night Muriel could not sleep. She told herself it was over-fatigue, and was horrified at the dark lines beneath her eyes in the morning.

"I will ride," she said. "There is nothing so refreshing as a good gallop."

She started out, turning her horse's head towards the Row—then hesitated. Some intuition warned her not to go. She seldom believed in presentiments, but this one startled her. A desperate longing to get out of town made her decide on Richmond Park as the best place for a canter, and the thought became more delightful as she rode on. "Richmond Park." These two words rang in her ears. She longed for a sight of the deer and the shady trees, the large expanse of soft green turf. Faster she urged her steed—away from the city of London to sweeter, purer air. As her horse passed through the gates into the grass beyond, another rider came in sight. At first Muriel did not recognise him, but as he approached, a vague dread crept over her, and a second later Courtenay Somerville was at her side.

"I thought you would come," he said excitedly. "I knew it!"

"Don't talk so loudly, or my groom will hear. I never meant to meet you."

A flush of anger spread its tell-tale crimson over her cheek, and then left it paler than before.

"I willed it," he whispered mysteriously. "I made you come. It was to prove my power!"

She laughed scornfully, turning her mocking eyes upon him.

"If such power can give you a pleasant companion at every turn, what a useful gift to possess! My friend! I cannot take all you say au grand sérieux. It would be too ridiculous."

"You blind yourself to all that displeases you, but the day will come when you must and shall believe."

"I hope you do not try your experiments on nervous girls. It might frighten them. As to me—you may 'will' me as you like, for I never consider anybody but myself. I stand at my own helm, and no other hand can guide me."

Her pride and self-assurance amused him. He smiled, and Muriel noticed his eyes were filled with cunning, while the touch of his fingers on the horse's mane caused the animal to start and shiver, as though charged with electricity.

"Are you going to the McClintocks' to-night? They have a musical evening."

"If you intend to honour them," replied Courtenay, "I shall be there."

Miss Adeane looked at her admirer critically. He was a fine specimen of manhood—bold, handsome, tall, and young. She felt a little glad he loved her. The intercourse of hearts was sweet.

When they returned, Courtenay knew he had advanced a step nearer the victory.

That night they met again. Miss Adeane declared the music was not good, and Courtenay led the way to a balcony, where a low lounge had been placed. Muriel settled herself among the cushions, and gazed vaguely out into the darkness.

"I don't know why I came," she said at last. "I think it was because I wanted to see you."

"How very flattering," he replied with a wave of her fan which he was holding. But the air it created seemed heated to Muriel, and she took it from him.

"Do not imagine it is your irresistible fascination, for at times I almost hate you. Your presence overpowers me!" she declared.

A short laugh broke from his lips and rang out on the evening breeze, as, rising excitedly, he leant against the railings. They were the only occupants of the balcony, and Muriel tried to rise also, for she longed to get away from him.

"Take me in," she said faintly. A deadly sense of fatigue crept over her. She glanced up and saw his eyes glistening. "Please do not look at me like that, I cannot stand it."

"Own that I have a little power over you," he whispered in reply, gazing more fixedly. "Own it, once for all."

She tried to smile and rise, denying there could be any truth in his assertion. She would fain have laughed him to scorn, but no words came. Miss Adeane remained among the cushions mute and staring in front of her as one in a trance.

"Come!" he said steadily. "You are not yourself. I will take you in."

Courtenay Somerville knew well what he had done, and felt no surprise that even before his victim staggered to her feet, she fell back helpless, while her head sank heavily upon the sofa. It was not the first time he had mesmerised a woman. For fully ten minutes he stood watching the sleeping girl, and not attempting to wake her—his ambition gratified—his conquest attained. She was white to the very lips, and scarcely appeared to breathe at all. Presently he took one limp hand firmly in his, rapping her sharply on the forehead with the other.

"Wake up!" he cried imperiously. "Do you hear me? Wake up!"

Muriel heaved a sigh, and moved her head. There was a slight stir among the silken pillows, and then she raised herself wearily, while she clung to him—trembling and weeping.

"Courtenay!" she gasped. "Courtenay, don't leave me! I am so frightened."

In a moment his arms were round her, and their strong support brought comfort.

"You love me?" she murmured. "What a beautiful dream!"

"Yes," he replied, "and to-morrow, Muriel, you will marry me?"

"To-morrow!" She passed her hand over her forehead, and tried to think. Then she said again: "To-morrow!"

"Your aunt will be away, and I shall fetch you, during her absence, in my carriage. I knew you would consent to-night, and I have made all arrangements."

She laid her hand on his shoulder.

"I know nothing now except that I love you. When the spell is broken we will talk of marriage."

The following day, as he had said, Muriel was left alone. She remembered but vaguely the events of the previous evening, till Courtenay Somerville's appearance brought them back only too vividly.

"I have come to fetch you," he said, "as I promised last night. A drive will do you good, and on the way I will tell you where we are going."

Miss Adeane did not know why, but she obeyed him like a child, and she did not realise until they were speeding through the streets that the object of their drive was without explanation.

"We are going to a registry office," he told her. "Love cannot wait. It is now or never! You must marry me to-day or not at all!"

"To-day then let it be!" she cried, clasping her hands. "I would sooner die than lose you."

"I only hope your devotion is sincere!"

"Yes; I have never been denied anything. I require you above all the world."

For fully ten minutes he stood watching the sleeping girl.

"This is romantic. It reminds me of the dark ages. We are off to Gretna Green!"

So they talked on till the horses drew up in front of a house, into which Courtenay led the way. Muriel signed her name mechanically, but her mind was a blank, and she could hardly recollect what had taken place as they passed out.

"Where are we going?" she asked, turning her flushed face to Courtenay.

"I am taking you back to your home," he replied coldly, and his voice sounded strained and hard.

She started involuntarily.

"Why?" she gasped. "What are you going to do?"

"I shall go abroad to-morrow alone."

"But I do not understand. We are married!"

"Then let me explain. The whole thing has been a play! I have won my bet, and you, I hope, have learnt a lesson. You, who had broken so many hearts, dared me to try my power. Now that I have shown you the full force of that power, I am going away. The little trick that has been played will be kept as secret as the grave. Ernest Mitchell was the man who handed you the paper and watched you sign. He disguised himself. The others were also men I know, and they came to witness it themselves. They could hardly believe their eyes! Here is the paper. Keep it, or tear it in a thousand atoms, and fling it into the fire of forgetfulness. Ours was no marriage, and you will find there is not even any writing on the sheet where you signed your name. Imagination led you to believe there was. You were mesmerised at the time."

A cry of despair broke from Muriel's lips.

"It was wicked, cruel, and yet—yet—I loved you, and I think I love you still! You shall not leave me! Now that you have proved to your friends I am willing to take you, it is your duty to marry me. I will not blame you, but claim you as my right."

"My dear lady," he answered softly, "such a thing is impossible. Women have no power to charm my soul, thank Heaven! I am free, and intend to remain so."

Miss Adeane leant back in the carriage and stifled a sob. Her teeth were clenched, and there was a dangerous look in her eyes.

"You were right," she muttered at last. "I was mesmerised. I hated you from the first, and I have always despised you in my heart. Your very touch is pollution; your every word an insult. When we meet again, Mr. Somerville, I will repay you."

The carriage had drawn up, and she sprang from it eagerly, refusing his proffered aid. Her eyes blazed with indignation as he bowed her a last farewell.

"Au revoir," she said in her low, musical voice, which reached his ear, and his alone. "Not until I am equal with you will I say adieu!"

"Forewarned is forearmed," he answered, raising his hat. "Besides, revenge never satisfies. Only the ignorant practise it, and the foolhardy feel its whip."

"Then I think you will suffer!" Muriel replied slowly, as she turned away.

II.

"NOTHING is bad enough for men!" said Muriel. "They do so much harm in the world. It is well to give them a rub back sometimes!"

Her aunt looked up, surprised. "My dear child, I am sure you have no old scores to remember, and even if you had, it would be more Christian to forget them, now fate has been so good to you."

"I suppose it is tremendously lucky to come into a huge fortune at four-and-twenty, and to have such a sweet creature as you, Aunt Cicely, to bear with me in all my moods. Yet, still I pity women! Especially those unfortunate individuals who have nothing to recommend them. I should die under the misfortune of an ugly face. When a man falls in love he can plead his own cause, but women have to wrap their unasked affection away in aching hearts, and only too often the secret love, that descends hidden to the grave, is the best and purest that the world can give. Wasted, yet still unquenched, it burns internally, eating its way like a deadly cancer into the soul."

"Why, Muriel, one would almost think you had been crossed in love."

"What an absurd idea! No; I was talking of the whole sex, and showing you they are at a disadvantage. I have entirely left myself out of the argument, for, of course, I could buy a husband any day."

"You have so many friends it would indeed be strange if amongst them you had not many admirers."

"People talk of being 'in love,' but they never name the opposite state of mind and become 'in hate.' How odd it would be to say: 'I have fallen in hate!' Would it not?"

Mrs. Vincent smiled. She was so unoriginal herself that she considered Muriel the most entertaining companion imaginable, and hung upon her words with flattering interest.

"By-the-way, Aunt Cicely, do you happen to remember Mr. Somerville?"

"Yes. He has been absent a long while; we have not seen him for years. He left, I remember, rather suddenly, and I mentally added him to the list of your victims."

"He has returned to town, and I have asked him to come and see me."

"When do you expect him?"

"This very afternoon."

"I had promised to go to the Gordons' 'At Home.'"

"By all means fulfil your engagement, as I can quite well receive him alone."

"I shall not be gone long, my dear."

"Oh, do not hurry on my account! I have frequently entertained a host of visitors while you were enjoying a peaceful siesta upstairs, far away through the ivory gate of dreams. Go, my good aunt, and amuse yourself. Drink a lot of tea and talk any amount of scandal!"

"Muriel, you know I never pull my acquaintances to pieces."

"Not literally—and, after all, speech is our own, to use as we please. Half the flavour of conversation would vanish if an Act of Parliament were passed to bridle tongues."

Muriel flung herself into an easy chair, and picked up a book.

"Good-bye, Aunt Cicely," she said, without raising her eyes.

She sat alone, perfectly still, for a long time, with the book open before her, but unread, and then started suddenly. Someone was coming upstairs, and she sprang to her feet, holding her breath. Muriel expected to see Courtenay Somerville, instead of whom Henry Erskine entered the room, and she went forward to greet him with mixed feelings of disappointment and relief. He was her old and trusted solicitor—a man she had known all her life, and who took the entire management of her affairs. She consulted him in everything, and had perfect confidence in his judgment.

"I have called several times lately," he said, "in hopes of finding you alone."

"So you chose my 'At Home' day," she replied laughing.

"Unfortunately, and twice I have found you out."

"What have you to say that is so secret and important?"

Mr. Erskine looked at her steadily.

"Perhaps you will be annoyed with me for mentioning it, but I am going to give you a word of advice simply from a sense of duty and friendship."

"You mystify me."

"Well, I will come to the point at once. Miss Adeane, you have made a very undesirable acquaintance. Forgive me for blackening your friend, but you have no father—no one who could warn you against him."

"And his name?"

"Mervyn Dalbiac, one of the cleverest swindlers of the day. He has initiated himself into your good graces because you are rich. His trade is a very simple one. He will probably lead you to believe he is a great financier, and offer to treble your fortune in a couple of months. He will do you out of thousands if you fall into his trap. Don't listen to his schemes, and steer clear of the money market. He has been the ruin of numerous unwary speculators, and is on the hunt for more. It is his business. I am speaking plainly, for it is my privilege to warn you, as I consider him one of the greatest blackguards in the city. I was perfectly horrified when I met him at your house."

"You astonish me! I have always looked upon Mr. Dalbiac as a most harmless individual. But do you really think so badly of him?"

"Indeed, I was never more in earnest in my life. Your interests, Miss Adeane, concern me, and in this case I am absolutely certain caution is necessary."

"Then let me thank you heartily for your valuable advice. I know you are the truest friend I have in the world."

Digitized by Google

"You will not pin your faith to him if he spreads the most tempting nets and opens gold mines at your feet?"

"No. When he commences a great harangue on finance I shall know what to expect."

"Now I have unburdened my mind I must leave you, for my time is precious; and forgive this very fleeting visit, as well as the advice you have taken so kindly."

"It is most kind of you to spare me even two minutes of your valuable day."

As Henry Erskine left her, Courtenay Somerville was announced.

Muriel welcomed him cordially, extending her hand with a smile.

"You are quite a stranger," she said sweetly.

"Yes; and I trust you will regard me as such, for Muriel welcomed him cordially.

strangers may grow into friends—that is, if you can forgive and forget the past?"

"It may seem strange that I should wish to see you after our parting, but I am a little wiser now. I thought I knew the world then, when I tempted you to prove your power. We cease playing with fire when our fingers get burnt! You taught me my mistake, yet I do not blame you. It was humiliating at the time, but, believe me, I have swept it from my mind like a dream of the night."

"I hardly dared to hope for so much kindness."

"Do you know, I quite enjoy discussing old times."

"I think the new ones are still more interesting."

"Perhaps; but I have so much to occupy me now, since a turn of fortune's wheel made me one of the richest women in England."

"And you still live with your aunt?"

"Oh, yes! She is a sort of niece to me. We—the orphan and the widow—both feel sadly destitute of family ties."

"Yet half the world might envy you!"

"Men, doubtless, covet my money, and I can feel with them, for I was not always rich. They would sacrifice everything to the golden calf when the fever is once on them. Like Judas, they touch the accursed coin, and give up their lives to buying, selling, and getting gain, and when the end comes——"

"Do not talk of that," interrupted Courtenay. "Live in the present, die in the present, and leave the 'after' vague."

Muriel sighed. He drew his chair closer and leant forward.

"I cannot tell you how delighted I am to be with you again. You will never know the remorse I have suffered, nor how bitterly I regret the past. I believe I was possessed of a devil!"

"Very likely, there are plenty of them about."

"Oh, please do not laugh!"

"Why?"

"I cannot bear to see others cheerful when I am sad," he muttered with downcast eyes.

"As selfish as ever!"

He glanced up and saw the calm, sweet look return to her face, that look which only dwelt there in her happiest moments, and though she spoke jestingly, there was sympathy in her eyes.

"What a fool I was once!" he thought, grinding his teeth.

"Why are you unhappy?"

"The world has been treating me badly. While it has given you everything, it has left me practically destitute."

"You have spent your substance in riotous living, and now you are grinding the husks."

"You jump at conclusions. I was relying on an uncle, who is the head of a large firm in the City, to start me in business. However, he has just married a widow with four sons, all over six feet, and will do nothing for me."

"How very unfortunate! But why despair? There is a 'multitude of business.'"

"Not for men like me."

"Why?"

"I have no capital."

"I am glad you told me, for it is terrible to be cramped for the sake of a helping hand. If ever it be in my power, I will show you there are still such things as true forgiveness and undying friendship lingering in this dark world."

Before he had time to thank her, their solitude à deux was interrupted by Mrs. Vincent's return, and the conversation drifted to general topics, only occasionally his eyes met hers, in a swift glance of mutual confidence.

"Will you dine with us to-morrow?" Muriel said, as he rose to go. "Mervyn Dalbiac is coming, and I should like you to meet him."

Courtenay gladly accepted. His hopes ran high, and the prize he had once so scornfully discarded now offered the only way of escape from the cramping clasp of poverty.

III.

After their first meeting Miss Adeane frequently entertained Mervyn Dalbiac and Courtenay Somerville. They struck up a friendship that she encouraged in every possible way, and while Courtenay's visits occurred daily, Mr. Dalbiac's became more numerous and lengthy than of yore.

"You are not looking well," the latter told her one day as they were sitting together in her boudoir. "You have been shutting yourself up and losing your interest in society."

"Yes, it is early days to grow tired of pleasure; but the fact is I am heartily sick of a perpetual round of gaiety."

"It is quite strange to hear you talk so seriously."

"Oh, I am not such a frivolous being as you imagine, Mr. Dalbiac! I can be sensible sometimes. Men sneer at our sex and think us empty-headed. If they would treat us as their equals they might find out what we really are."

"But women cannot share our graver interests. Look at business, for instance. They do not understand ——"

"There you are wrong! I, for one, take the keenest interest in finance. I have often longed to talk to you on the subject."

Mr. Dalbiac's eyes glistened. "It is my daily occupation to increase the fortunes of others," he said. "Everything I touch turns to gold."

"That is because you are so clever. Oh, it is wonderful to be such a great financier. There is nothing in the world I admire more in a man."

"Miss Adeane, I am delighted to hear you speak so, as I am deeply absorbed at present in a scheme which is practically bound to succeed. It will prove a trump card for all concerned—a master-stroke of business!"

"I should like to hear about it, if it is anything in which I could buy a share. I have promised to help Courtenay Somerville, who is a very old and dear friend of mine, and should this prove anything in which I could interest him, and if by its means I could help him to amass a fortune on his own account, I would gladly supply the capital. You understand?"

"Perfectly. You were always generous!"

"He is really in straitened circumstances, and for a man of his social standing it is utter beggary. I cannot bear to think of the penury some endure, while their moneyed friends continue to live on the fat of the land, without raising a finger to help them. Friends, indeed! That is not my idea of friendship!"

"What noble sentiments!" ejaculated Mr. Dalbiac, raising his eyes.

"Now, if you will tell me your scheme," said Muriel, "I will give you my undivided attention."

"Candidly, I do not think you will be disappointed. I myself am infatuated with the idea. A friend of mine has discovered a wonderful application of electricity, which will revolutionise the present lighting system. The electric light is acknowledged to be the very best, the only drawback being its costliness. Under his invention, the cost will be reduced to a minimum, and the benefit of it placed in the hands of the million. The profits are quite incalculable, and the only thing wanted now to produce it on a scale to show its practicability is capital."

He spoke excitedly, and Miss Adeane seemed to have caught his ardour, her eyes brightened, she bent forward involuntarily.

"Go on—I am listening."

Mr. Dalbiac, encouraged by her interest, broached the most important subject.

"If you feel inclined to find this capital," he said, "I will enter more fully into details."

Muriel replied she had already told him so.

"But," she added, "I must confess my knowledge of business is limited. I cannot gauge what amount would be required."

"As you entertain the proposal, I will evolve my plans. The process is simplicity itself. The only marvel is that it should have remained so long overlooked by more scientific electricians. Under the present system the electricity is produced by a motor, and, through a process which I need not describe, makes a thread inclosed in a glass vacuum in a state of incandescence, which gives the light. The amount of electricity consumed is very great, and hence its heavy cost. Now my friend has discovered that by filling this vacuum with a certain species of gas, and by passing a very slight current, which can be procured from a small battery, this gas becomes highly illuminated, and gives out many times the light of the present incandescent burner at a nominal cost. Now picture to yourself for a moment a light that must supersede every other, costing a hundredth part of the best at present known. Think what it would be in your own house—no gas bills, no electric light bills, and your lighting rates reduced to the vanishing point! It would be the greatest boon of modern times! Its brilliancy is dazzling—bewildering. It would flood our streets, our houses, our theatres, with a wealth obtained by no other artificial means. We should rise, as it were, from a chaos of darkness, and bless the man whose fertile brain had organised so marvellous a public benefit!"

Mr. Dalbiac spoke quickly, without pausing. He continued his subject in a lower tone, however, and there was a touch of regret in his voice.

"I have only one feeling of hesitation, Miss Adeane," he said thoughtfully, "and that is pity for the unfortunate shareholders in gas and electric light companies. It is, alas! a terrible look-out for them! But, after all, we cannot prevent their downfall. The few must suffer for the many—the individual for the nation. It can be kept for an after-consideration whether, out of the millions which must flow into our pockets, we should set apart a sum for their relief. Prosperity should not permit us to neglect the duty we owe to the poverty-stricken people—ruined through our success."

"How charitable you are!" said Muriel softly. "Very few men would have such a thought in the midst of their own triumph. I decidedly favour your praiseworthy suggestion."

Then she went into the question of how much capital would be required to rake in these millions, hardly suppressing her inclination to ask him whether they might not eventually immortalise their names by paying off the National Debt. The amount seemed startlingly small—only £10,000 cash, and £10,000 in shares of a syndicate company of £20,000—of which she was to provide the money.

"I will readily assent to that," said Miss Adeane, upon hearing the sum, "on two conditions."

Mr. Dalbiac could hardly conceal his surprise. Why had he not trebled the figure? Suppressing his vexation, he said simply:

"What are your conditions, Miss Adeane?"

"First, that Mr. Somerville looks thoroughly into the matter and advises me upon it. Secondly, that the prospectus be advertised once in one daily paper, so that I may feel the public have had a chance of participating to some small exent in this El Dorado."

Muriel's reply staggered Mr. Dalbiac. For a moment there was a pause, and she noticed a dark shadow flit across his face. Then he broke into a tirade upon the ingratitude of the public, and the waste of their future profits, for a mere sentiment. But Miss Adeane stuck to her point, asking, as she silenced his objections, how much of the capital she was to be allowed to take.

She . . . . looked out at the sun.

"The whole of the cash capital," he replied; "£10,000."

A few details as to how this sum was to be disposed of had to be gone into, and the form of the prospectus to be considered.

"Nine thousand of it," said Mr. Dalbiac, "is to go to my friend the inventor, and one thousand to be used for publicly showing the light."

He enlarged upon the fortunate circumstances for her that his friend was so pressed for money he was obliged to take it, instead of shares, for his invention. Their conversation ended by a promise from Mr. Dalbiac that Somerville should benefit by being appointed a director, and a reminder on her part that his certificate as to the bonâ fides of the concern should appear on the prospectus.

Mr. Dalbiac left in the highest spirits, and went straight to Courtenay Somerville, to whom he explained in glowing terms what had passed. A meeting between them in the City on the following day was then agreed upon.

Muriel appeared greatly agitated when she was again alone. Her face had grown paler, and her lips trembled. She paced the room in that restless impetuous manner which denotes a mind ill at ease.

"I cannot help it," she muttered under her breath, struggling with a stormy gust of passion. "It is fight for yourself in this world. Revenge your wrongs measure for measure. God alone knows my grievance rankled till it turned my soul to gall."

She went to the window and looked out at the sun.

"It is shining!" she said. "Shining like a great globe of electrified gas."

IV.

Courtenay knew nothing of business, and his ideas on the subject were decidedly vague. It gratified his vanity that he had been able to reassert his influence over Miss Adeane, upon renewing her acquaintance. Now her friendship—ah! more than that—her love, could be of service to him, and his heart grew buoyant at the thought.

He met Mr. Dalbiac at the appointed hour in his office, where the latter explained the invention even more graphically than on the previous afternoon. In a corner of the room sat an insignificant individual, who evidently with an effort suppressed adding the deferential "Sir" to every reply he made to Mr. Dalbiac's questions. He was Mark Snewleigh, the inventor of the "World's Lighting Revolution." When the matter had been thoroughly explained to Somerville, the prospectus was placed before him for his approval. Mr. Dalbiac drew his attention to a brilliant light in the office, and proceeded in a most bewildering and voluminous manner to describe its action. Having done so, he handed him a letter for his signature, addressed to Mark Snewleigh—the wording being as follows:

Sir,—I agree to accept a seat on the Board of the "Gazelectro Lighting Syndicate," having thoroughly satisfied myself of its practicability and adaptability. I have also satisfied myself that the cost per candle power is not more than one-tenth of that of any known light. It must, therefore, unquestionably revolutionise the lighting of the civilised world.

As Courtenay ran his eye over the document, his face assumed a puzzled expression, and he read it twice before speaking, the second time more carefully than the first. Then he laid it down, and remarked in tones denoting surprise:

"But how can I sign such a letter, when I don't know the facts to which I am certifying?"

"I can satisfy you at once," replied Mr. Dalbiac promptly, and proceeded to describe, in a technical and very confusing manner, batteries, currents, gases, vacuums, candle-power, etc., till Somerville felt undecided as to whether he knew all or nothing about the subject in question. In his indecision Dalbiac fired his big gun and hit the target. "I omitted to tell you," he said, with his bland smile, "that the vendor here, who is being paid partly in cash for his invention, recognises the fact of the enormous value to him of your knowledge in business matters, and wishes you to accept one-fourth of the money for your services."

Somerville never did a sum quicker in his head, and the words were hardly out of Dalbiac's mouth before he had realised that one-fourth of £9,000 was £2,250. The temptation was too great. He persuaded himself it must be right, since he had Dalbiac's word for it. Of course, Miss Adeane merely requested his opinion out of compliment, and there could be little doubt the thing was perfectly genuine. Thus he argued with his conscience, Mr. Dalbiac urging him the while, till finally his irresolution turned to decision. He came to the conclusion that the letter was concise enough, and signed his name in full.

He bent his head in assent.

"The Board of Directors," said Mr. Dalbiac, "will consist of you, the inventor, and myself."

Courtenay looked furtively towards Mark Snewleigh, who had been silent throughout. He appeared utterly incapable of revolutionising anything, and merely assented, somewhat nervously, when referred to by Mr. Dalbiac.

"These clever people appear to have very little to say for themselves," thought Somerville wonderingly.

"We can have a larger Board if you wish it," continued Dalbiac hastily, "but, if you will give the time and work, I think it would be a pity to reduce the fees by further division. The emolument for the Board I propose should be £500 a year; you, as chairman, taking £300, and the vendor dividing the remainder with me. Besides this, it should be arranged for a percentage of the profits to come to the Board, which would bring you in a very handsome income."

As Somerville's mind imbibed all this, the sudden overwhelming good fortune seemed too wonderful to be true.

He announced his intention on parting with Dalbiac of going at once to see Miss Adeane.

"You can tell her exactly how matters stand, Somerville," he said, "for she is a thorough business woman, and has a wonderful head. She takes a thing in directly, and is quite astoundingly sharp."

Courtenay detained Miss Adeane's little gloved hand longer than usual upon meeting her in the hall.

"I was starting for a drive," she said.

"I have come to thank you most heartily," he murmured, "for all you are about to do for me. I cannot express my gratitude—I should be thanking you every moment of the day."

He spoke so earnestly that for a moment her heart stood still. She then turned away from him with a shudder.

"For Heaven's sake don't thank me! I detest being thanked. I would rather you never mentioned the matter again. I do not want gratitude, for to me it is of all things the most hateful."

Her harsh tone jarred on his feelings, and her retort confused him. She noticed his discomfort, and tried to make amends, while her voice became pleading and persuasive.

"You won't thank me any more?" she said, and her eyes were so grave that it gave her whole face a mournful expression. "It is the one thing I ask you in return."

He bent his head in assent.

"Mr. Dalbiac is a great financier," she said, changing the subject; "I have perfect confidence in all he does. You may safely rely on his judgment, and be guided by him in everything, as there is no doubt he is an exceptionally clever man. Here is Aunt Cicely. You will come with us?"

He appreciated her objection to being thanked, and followed her to the carriage, with a thrill of happiness quivering through his frame.

V.

Gazelectricity progressed steadily, and the prospectus appeared in due course in one daily paper, Mr. Dalbiac being careful to select the least likely to bring it under public notice. Miss Adeane had a copy of the newspaper, and one of the prospectus, both of which she locked carefully away in her safe. The response from the British public was small, owing to the limited circulation of the chosen daily. Nevertheless, it came into the hands of sufficient very young men and guileless old ladies to extract from them a total of £5,000. The shares were duly allotted, and the same fate befell Miss Adeane's application for the remaining £5,000. The first payment made by the company was £2,250 to Courtenay Somerville and the next £6,750 to the vendor. After this Somerville was told there would be no active business done for some time.

One night he was dining at the Savoy with his friend, Jack Percival, a young solicitor, to whom he enlarged on his good fortune.

Dining at the Savoy.

"It is quite a new line of business for me," he said cheerfully, "the directorship of a company. I never had much of a head for that sort of thing, but this is quite sound. It has paid me already £2,250 as a start, and the joke of it is they wanted to get hold of me for my knowledge! I suppose Miss Adeane stuffed them up. Dalbiac got her to put the money into it."

"I hope you were properly advised in the first place, for it is a dangerous thing nowadays to put your name to a prospectus. Who looked into the contracts for you to see if they were properly drawn?"

Somerville hesitated and began to feel rather a fool. "I—well, to tell you the truth, I never saw a contract."

His friend grew suddenly grave, and told him he had acted most rashly. Jack Percival could put a case clearly, and showed him his mistake in such a new and unpleasant light, that he became thoroughly alarmed. The folly of his implicit faith in Dalbiac presented itself to his mind in a painfully aggravating manner, till he worked himself into a perfect fever of apprehension.

"I have no doubt it is all right, old fellow," said Jack consolingly. "Don't worry over it to-night, but these things have a nasty way of tricking one sometimes, and of turning out in a confoundedly awkward way."

"I have an appointment with Dalbiac to-morrow in the City. Will you come with me and look into the matter? I shall not rest till my doubts are dispelled. You have made me most horribly uncomfortable."

After asking some further particulars of the company, Jack readily agreed to accompany him.

* * * * *

Miss Adeane was lounging in the luxurious apartment she called her sanctum. The day was hot and depressing, and she had fallen half asleep over a novel. Every luxury conducive to ease and comfort met her eyes as she raised them drowsily, and let them wander round. Numerous quaint and grotesque embellishments caught her gaze at every turn, and each detail of wealth and splendour gave her a delicious sense of satisfaction. She looked dreamily at the velvet tapestries and costly decorations, and from them to the paintings, the flowers, and the sculpture.

Courtenay Somerville broke in upon her reverie, and she rose to greet him with her ready smile. His hand as she took it was deathly cold.

"I am in great trouble," he said tremulously. "Something very terrible has happened."

Muriel showed no sign of surprise.

"Dalbiac has disappeared," he continued, while his voice sounded hollow. "I have been duped and fooled! Percival first opened my eyes. We went together to find him, but he had gone and left no address. The Gazelectricity was a snare, a fraud, and I—I have been their tool. I was induced to accept part of the purchase money, which I have spent, and have no means of replacing. The shareholders can come down on me for this, while they can prosecute me for giving a fraudulent certificate since I was a director, and receiving money as a vendor, without disclosing the fact on the prospectus. I come here to throw myself upon your mercy, Miss Adeane. To implore you of your boundless wealth to buy up all the shares in the hands of the public, and to bury the company, and so prevent my being exposed to ruin and disgrace. I know you will do this, for you sacrificed so much to help me. You could not wish your good intentions to put me in so terrible a position."

Courtenay tried to suppress his emotion and speak calmly, but Muriel's utter indifference only excited him the more in his overwrought condition. He had looked for the ready sympathy—the kindly pity—and he feasted his eyes hungrily upon her, as though seeking a ray of hope.

"It is all very well for you to come and tell me this," she answered with a shrug of her shoulders, "but you looked into the matter, and certified to its accuracy upon the prospectus."

"Fool that I was!" he broke in angrily, "to be tempted by such a bait."

"Consequently, Mr. Somerville," she continued, eyeing him with languid disapproval, "you are responsible."

"I know it! I know it!" he replied, struggling to retain his self-command. "But I was tricked and cheated by your friend. The light was never produced by the means he represented—the means to which I was deluded into certifying. Perhaps you have not realised my position to its full extent——"

She held up her hand. "I must ask you not to worry me with details. I understand the facts as clearly as you do yourself."

"You mean you will not raise a hand to save me?" he asked breathlessly.

"Did you consider me when you made me the butt of that cruel jest?" replied Muriel slowly, and her face flushed hotly as she spoke.

For a moment Courtenay was too dazed to answer. He could hardly grasp her meaning. His lips moved, but he said nothing.

She watched him in silence as he clung to the back of a chair. The evil triumph of her nature flashed out in pitiless exultation, while the pent-up hatred of years blazed forth from her eyes, and a victorious, jeering laugh broke from her lips. She had conquered his influence and revelled in it.

"You have courted your torture," she said at last. "You have implanted with your own hand this desire in my heart to see you fall. I have had but one toil, one aim, one hope. To level you to the dust as you lowered me."

Her words vibrated with cruel intensity, and it was sweet to her to see the man she hated quivering from head to foot with blanched face, while his control forsook him; to note the amazed fixity into which his features set, as he gazed at her in a mute stupor! Once he would have spoken, but she stayed him with a gesture.

"My plans were laid as deeply as was your plot to entrap me," she continued, still with the same mocking smile, "and, notwithstanding your age and experience, you walked as unwarily into my net as a child, comparatively. I have encircled your life with the iron bonds of retribution! Have you forgotten how you humiliated me? Remember it now! Had the past glided from your mind as a buried episode? Let it rise from its grave to see justice! You became accursed and abhorrent to me from the day when you first made me your toy and put me to open ridicule to win a paltry bet. You thought the fury of the storm had abated! After a lapse of years you did not reckon upon a yawning gulf beneath the electric glare. Your eyes were blinded by flattery and artifice, and you thought that fortune's fingers were already in your grasp when you held my hand and whispered words of devotion! Oh! a man can little realise that a woman may have the soul of an avenger; that she can strike him down and break his spirit, as he would fain have broken hers. He cannot believe her heart is hard so long as her lips smile and her voice sounds softly on his ear!"

Muriel turned her scornful eyes full upon him with haughty power and bitter irony. The disdain of the look seemed to wither him up like a devouring flame, and involuntarily he stretched out his arms.

"For the mercy of God remember what you have brought me to," he cried, hoarse with anguish and breathless with despair. "Your vengeance condemns me to death in life! I shall be arrested unless I fly the country. Oh, how could I be so blind to your merciless scheming? In the glory of your exultation may the vileness of your sin find you out! When the ashes of an overpowering fate have hidden me for ever from your sight, may your own conscience condemn you and cheat you of your fiendish joy. Though your proud and ice-cold heart may never own regret, some bitter sadness will sigh through the memories of your youth when you think of the man you wrecked and ruined to satisfy a devil's craving!"

Her eyes remained with their gaze riveted upon Courtenay as he spoke. The supreme moment of her life had come! No words could move her to mercy, while the hard smile which still flickered round her lips silenced the plea that trembled on his tongue and changed it to a curse. Then Muriel, with a sudden impulse, crossed the room, and in the unbroken silence rang the bell.

"We are quits," she said, with pitiless self-possession. "This makes us equal. You deserve your fate. If you remember once I only said au revoir—now, Mr. Somerville, I will say adieu!"

The Romance of an Australian Christmas Tree.

JOHN RAINUPP, the driver, had been speculating upon the white-haired stranger on the seat beside him ever since the North Queensland coach left the railway station. He wanted a square look into his eyes before venturing a "feeler," but the big slouched hat prevented that. So, as they got within sight of the town on the slopes ahead of them, the old driver turned his attention to the only other passenger on the box, and pointed out the buildings that came into view.

"And that's the orphanage," he continued, pointing to a white building in the midst of a grove of evergreen trees on the brow of the slope ahead of them. "Percival Hanson's money started it, but they have hard work to keep it going. Always hampered for funds, unlucky from the first start fifteen years ago. They had a fire, then they were robbed of a round sum——"

"Robbed? Who would rob orphans?" interrupted the passenger.

"Well, nobody expected it of Dick when he was trusted with the money. He got into wild company, and it went in some kind of speculation that was to double it. Served a sentence in prison for it. Too bad. I suppose he's gone to the dogs since. Precious few ever get over that disgrace. Pity. I knew Dick from a boy. He was awful good-hearted."

"Yes. Robbery of orphans was a fine proof of goodness," returned the old gentleman with cutting sarcasm.

"Well, he only meant to borrow the money," said John.

"Poor excuse to cheat the fatherless," persisted the other with severity.

"There's Millicent Andrews on her way to the orphanage," pursued John, as the coach reached the level beyond the slope. "She's taught the children to sing like nightingales for Christmas. There's to be a tree in the grounds, and a big time."

As he said this the stranger looked up and seemed to regard the young woman in a light muslin garment ahead of them with interest.

"She's done a lot for them first and last, and they worship her," said John. "Queer she don't get married," he added reflectively, as he touched up the greys, "but I don't know a man in Warrady good enough for her."

With the last words the greys dashed round the curve and brought up in fine style before the Warrady Hotel.

The silent stranger was christened "The Mystery" very shortly. He had meals sent to his rooms. "J. H. Afterforth" on the hotel register was as noncommittal as his ponderous strapped trunks. Always with hat down, he took long, lonely walks about the town and its outskirts.

He might be a harmless lunatic, it was conjectured, until he was seen to go in and out of the orphanage several times, when it got about that he was a rich, eccentric relative of one of the children, who, if he found all things on the square, was likely to give them a handsome Christmas donation. In fact, Mr. Melladew, the superintendent, admitted that he had hopes a new friend had been raised up to them.

* * * * *

The lawn of the house belonging to Captain Andrews was the centre of attraction on Christmas Eve. Curious rumours were afloat—although the Tree Committee had been personified caution—that the three ponderous trunks were to turn tell-tales, and that "The Mystery" was to have not only a finger but both arms and shoulders, up to his ears, in the festivities.

As the sun set on the warm, Australian Christmas Day, Captain Andrews stepped out of his door, then his wife, then Millicent, to welcome the first arrivals, who came, hurrying, converging from all points, laughing, chattering, wondering what the evening was to bring forth, and all passing into the grounds until the seats provided were full.

Once inside they found themselves in a bower of evergreens, and, of all things, two Christmas trees blazing away in splendour! One, the usual size, hung with the usual quota of Christmas presents, was completely overshadowed by the other, which towered skywards, a very monarch of the woods, wearing its royal honours not unconsciously, but with the air of triumphant, tantalising mystery.

Everybody, from Mr. Merrivale, the minister, to deformed Billy Bowl, the grocer's small boy, was bowing and smiling to everybody else. The orphans were in the front seats in gala dress. There was much craning of necks and wondering over the tall tree and the mysterious father thereof, for it was well understood that the white-bearded stranger was the sole author and finisher of this transcendent surprise.

"Mebbe he's the Wandering Jew," suggested Billy Bowl, leaning forward on his crutch towards the tree.

"Looks more like Rip Van Winkle, with his white hair," dissented Ned, the barber's boy, who had lately seen Joe Jefferson from the "heaven" of a Sydney theatre.

"Pooh! Didn't I say he was Santa Claus himself the first day?" was the triumphant query of Ben, the hotel boy.

How these orphans' fingers laced and interlaced, and how their eyes flashed from tree to tree until both seemed to kindle into one blaze! How they aroused Millicent's reassuring smile, with confidence in their own ability to tune their throats when called upon!

In the midst of all, Millicent's eyes had a far-away reminiscent expression of sadness, as if she were occupying a sphere inside the radiant one around her. And "The Mystery," who was in a small shed beyond the platform with the Tree Committee, stood looking through the door at her, so absorbed that Rhoda Barker had to give him a smart shake to call his attention to the mask and toggery in which he must array himself at once.

"There he is! That's 'The Mystery!'" was the cry when Santa Claus, in fantastic array, with snowy head and the jolliest of rubicund faces, came forth flourishing a long wand with ribbon streamers, and took his stand between the two Christmas trees. For a minute the commotion in the air made the evergreens tremble.

The chairman mounted the platform, and after many shouts and much waste of breath brought the meeting to order. At a signal from Millicent, who played a piano accompaniment, the orphans bubbled and overflowed in a joyous Christmas carol which brought everybody into sympathetic unison, and fairly seemed to make the trees join arms and whirl each other round and round from sheer enthusiasm.

"See! see!" was echoed, as half-a-dozen Christmas fairies in misty tulle and spangled wings came filing out into the grounds.

Santa Claus marshalled them round him by quaint and curious flourishes of the wand he carried, and began to despoil the smaller tree. Its fruitage was soon scattered right and left by the dainty little messengers, and then Santa Claus, with more flourishes, turned to the other ready for invasion by the miniature world, which after all only remained for the larger one to plunder.

"Won't he need a long step-ladder to reach the top of it?" queried Billy Bowl.

"You watch him charm the things down," said Ned. "He's a wizard. That wand has magic in it."

"The children of the orphanage will prepare for the lion's share of the plunder," Santa Claus called out in jovial tones, and he broke up the flirtation under the bough abruptly by consigning the youth in a sailor suit to one fairy, and the long-lashed coquette to another, she uttering a little squeak of protest as he did so.

Clothing there was, too, piles of it, from blue and pink Tam-o'-Shanters down to patent-tipped shoes.

Santa Claus stood back from the tree with a view to dispersing the soft clouds clinging to the summit of the tall tree all the evening, as if it had settled down there from the summer sky of the tropics.

A touch of the wand and it materialised into a dainty India shawl. He flourished it aloft airily, turned round on his heels in apparent uncertainty as to its disposal, wound it into a fluffy ball with the wand and tossed it up, caught it dexterously, roved with his eyes all over the audience, balancing it, faced round to Millicent's quarter where the orphans beamed, faced back upon the Tree Committee, again to Millicent, letting his eyes rest upon her, and then everybody, watching his capers, saw the shawl descend and settle in graceful folds over her head and shoulders.

"What is the meaning of that tomfoolery, I wonder?" Captain Andrews muttered under his breath uneasily, and his shapely eyebrows lowered perceptibly as he noticed Millicent's smiling, blushing perplexity.

"So 'The Mystery' has let his mantle fall upon Millicent," remarked Dr. Chalifoux.

"It seems to belong there, doesn't it?" remarked Mr. Melladew, as his clear eyes searched her blonde face in the azure cloud with just a shade of anxiety.

"You know what it all means," challenged the doctor's wife.

"We shall see later," returned Mr. Melladew.

The fairies, having got through with the orphans, were now fluttering like silver butterflies all over the grounds with their hands full. Gift books with cream margins and handsome bindings, more baskets of candied fruits and bonbons, more dolls, and more animals for other children, until it did seem that "The Mystery" had had to find some outlet for his benevolence to avoid bursting outright. Billy Bowl had, besides books and sweetmeats, a complete outfit from top to toe.

At the last minute a small oblong box, with spring clasps was carried in both hands to Mr. Melladew by the eldest of the fairies. There were some conjectures over its contents, as he lifted the lid cautiously and closed it, shutting off the curious from even a peep.

The chairman mounted the table again, got a show of order, after labouring a full quarter of an hour for it, and made them understand that Mr. Melladew had something to say to them.

Mr. Melladew stood holding the mysterious box conspicuously until complete silence had fallen.

"Friends," he began slowly, as if he wished every word to be an apple of gold in a picture of silver, "you will, I think, be glad to know that the money taken from the orphanage funds ten years ago has been restored to us trebled."

He held up the box as he spoke, drew out of it a shining handful of coins, allowing them to fall back with a jingle.

There was a profound sensation.

"The older ones will remember the circumstances," he went on, with a furtive glance at Squire Halliday, "and that there was more of grief than indignation among us. Would we not be glad to know that he who did the deed has lived down both it and the disgrace bravely, has made an honourable place for himself among men, and has now come forward to repair the wrong?"

There was one suspended breath around him.

"If he were here, would you—could you—not even find it in your hearts to give him a frank and hearty hand of fellowship?"

"Yes! Yes! We would!" on all sides.

"Those in favour of Santa Claus unmasking at once will say 'I!'"

One tremendous and unanimous "I!" resounded.

Santa Claus stepped forward from the centre of the tall Christmas tree. He threw off his fantastic garments. The grotesque mask of the evening fell to his feet, carrying the white wig and beard along with it, and a man not over thirty, with a square jaw and pathetic dark eyes, which held the shadow of past suffering in them, stood bared to these questioning glances, with a mingling of shrinking sensitiveness and manly self-possession that won the hearts of the entire crowd.

Everybody swayed towards him. The older people were tracing the likeness of the brown, manly face to the boyish one they remembered before his life had suffered eclipse.

"I'm bothered if it isn't Dick Halliday himself!" was Captain Andrew's suppressed comment.

"Dick Halliday! Why, it's Dick, sure enough. Wouldn't you have known him anywhere?" sounded over the grounds.

Squire Halliday and his wife had their faces hidden.

"I thought there was something familiar about him the day he rode on the coach with me," said John Rainupp, in deep disgust at his own stupidity.

"He's a fine fellow if he has worn prison garb," was the comment of Dr. Chalifoux to Captain Andrews. "Comes of good stock, you see. Had the grit to live it down."

"Yes," assented the Captain absently. "I wish he had steered clear of the rocks in the first place," he added with his eyes on Millicent's face, now flooded with a mild radiance as of moonlight. It was plain she still loved him. If the broken engagement was to be reversed, why then——

Dick stood there silent. It was a trying ordeal, this bidding publicly for the respect and confidence of his townspeople with the taint of dishonour not yet outlived. To one of Dick's nature sin brings its own punishment. But, seconded by Mr. Melladew, he had dared all in this peculiar fashion, because he longed, let it be whispered, to be reinstated fully for the sake of Millicent, whose life he had so shamefully clouded.

The murmur in the grounds swelled to a round of heart-felt applause. What but large, generous sentiments could have been the outcome of that evening?

"My friends, I thank you," Dick began, and broke down completely.

Squire Halliday and his wife were making their way up to him. There were few dry eyes there as the father, whose proud heart had been bowed in shame over his dishonoured name, grasped Dick's outstretched hand, with a trembling, "God bless you, my son!" and the mother, whose heart had yearned over her wayward boy all these years, drew his head down upon her breast tenderly, and shed tears of joy upon his face.

"Makes me think of the night she first held him in her arms thirty years ago," said Dr. Chalifoux in a broken voice.

"Halliday ought to be proud of him," rejoined Lawyer Winthrop, whose pleading had shortened Dick's sentence. "It isn't every young fellow who can recover from a slip so thoroughly."

"No need, you see, of killing a boy for one mistake," said John Rainupp.

"No. But this seems to be a mighty fuss over a gaol-bird," rejoined Cyril Hubbard, the druggist, who had failed to win Millicent's favour in time past.

"Don't use that word again in my hearing," said John.

"Nor in mine! Nor in mine!" came from all those within earshot.

"I am master of my own tongue," retorted Cyril.

"I move we march round and give him a handshake," said Lawyer Winthrop.

Seconded and carried, and Dick, as they filed up to welcome him, wondered if it were only last night he had lain awake shrinking from imagined hisses and epithets, such as are apt to descend upon sinners of his type.

Up they came—Mr. Melladew beaming over the unanimous and hearty reception when he had feared deep-seated prejudice; the Rev. Mr. Merrivale, resting his hand on Dick's head with a hearty "Happy Christmas"; Dr. Chalifoux with a hard grip that spoke volumes. On and on they came, Billy Bowl and Ned, Maggy Maguire in her armchair, with tears on her lashes and a smile about her mouth.

Millicent, with sweet flushed face and tremulous lips, still in her cloud of drapery, letting her warm palm rest in his, frankly and tenderly even. Captain Andrews, with all reservations vanishing from his big, kindly nature, nurtured on the ocean, when he looked keen and close into Dick's half-pleading, honest eyes. The orphans, too, chocolates in their cheeks and "things" hugged under their arms—everybody, in fact, but Cyril, and really he ought to be excused, for a successful rival is a hard pill to swallow. Millicent's face had told tales.

At last came a general movement to the house, where a spread awaited those who were left with an appetite.

Dick was seated between his father and mother, who were flanked by Dr. Chalifoux, Lawyer Winthrop and the rest of the "old stock," and Mr. Melladew took out letters from Dick's friends in Melbourne and passed them round, and Dick must needs recount how he worked his way out to the West coast as a hand before the mast, and struck it rich in the gold-fields after a hand-to-hand tussle, and afterwards went into business in Peel, where he now had many friends, which he did with halting speech, modestly, for this whole-hearted ignoring of a grave misdeed by all of them quite overcame him.

* * * * *

So Dick came into the confidence of his home friends on the crest of the Christmas wave.

Through the Fire of the Commune

By Walter Rothwell.

"Jean, Jean, don't—don't go!"

"I must, Marie; we march for Versailles to-morrow. There, cheer up, little one, I shall soon be back. Prussians and rebels will leave Paris at rest, and when everything is quiet once more, we must be married."

"But, Jean, I am afraid. Father says Monsieur Thiers' soldiers will all be shot, and—oh, Jean—Jean——" she broke down and sobbed as if her heart would break.

The young man bit his lips to keep back his emotion.

"But see, dear," he said, as cheerfully as he could, "that is impossible. We shall soon put an end to this little riot. Be a brave girl and don't cry any more."

"And Monsieur Gruchon, Jean?"

The soldier's face fell, and the fear he had been so bravely trying to conceal, showed itself plainly.

"True, there is Gruchon," he said; and before his mind rose the wrinkled face, the horrible leer, the thick, protruding lips, of the old money-lender of the Rue des Martyrs.

It was in that street—where Marie lived with her father, Martial Buissonière—that Gruchon first saw her, six months ago. She thought, then, how strange it was that he smiled at, and made signs to her so often.

Jean was away with the army at the time, or he would soon have stopped the annoyance, for the old man had, besides, a curious way of creeping up unnoticed and whispering in her ear that alarmed her. But after all, perhaps it was only that he wished to be friendly with her, for she had never joined the other women in the street in execration and jeers when they caught sight of Gruchon. With them and with the gamins it was: "The old vampire—the leech—the pig of an usurer!" but Marie, who seldom said a harsh word of anyone, had never the heart to speak against the old man. She pitied him for his loneliness, his ugliness, even for his evil passions.

One evening, however, on returning from her work, she found the money-lender with her father, talking eagerly. As she entered they ceased their conversation abruptly, and Gruchon took his leave with a cunning smile and a "Good-evening, Mam'selle Buissonière."

All through the dinner her father was uneasy and embarrassed. At last, pressed by Marie, he confessed that his visitor had made a proposal for her hand.

The young girl was amazed, and then burst into a laugh.

"It is so droll!" she said. "I should not laugh at the poor man, but how can I help it? I—his wife! And give up poor Jean?" she added in a mock whimper, smiling at her father with pouting lips.

Martial sat looking into space, his thick, heavy eyebrows drawn down.

Marie rose and put her arm caressingly round his neck.

"Come, father, don't look so stern. Is it because I laughed? Well, I will do so no more; now go on with your dinner."

But still he scowled moodily.

"Marie," he said at length, "Gruchon is rich, he has property—houses and land, my child."

"Yes, father."

"He loves you, Marie."

"Father!"

"And now, since war has been declared, work is scarce. I can barely earn enough to buy bread," continued Martial, as if to himself.

His daughter sat as if turned into stone, listening.

"He is rich, he will make you a good husband, for he loves you. Jean—if he be not dead—will never have enough to marry——"

"Stop, father," and Marie rose to her feet proudly. "I belong to Jean, we are betrothed, and we love each other,"—then her dignity broke down and she burst into tears—"and I wouldn't marry that old man if—if—he owned the Bank of France." Then she ran into her bedroom and slammed the door.

All Martial's attempts to persuade his daughter were of no avail, and Gruchon's attentions only made her hate him.

At length, Jean, with the retreating remnant of the army, returned to Paris, and for a time the old moneylender ceased to annoy her.

During the horrors of the siege Marie was almost happy. Was not Jean fighting for her? Could she not see him, almost from day to day, and assure herself that he was safe! Only during the hopeless sorties—when the French were always driven back—she felt a horrible fear lest her sweetheart should be struck down, never to re-enter the gates.

Then came the capitulation and—the First of March!

On that day the Prussians entered Paris, and, amid the confusion, the National Guard, maddened at the disgrace of surrender, seized the cannon, and carried them to the heights of Monmartre. The rabble of the city thronged round the fort thus made, and foremost amongst them were Martial Buissonière and old Gruchon, inciting the people to deeds of violence, and urging the soldiery to rebel.

Thiers attempted in vain to recapture the guns; it was the signal for the war of the Commune, and, to avoid detection, the army was ordered to Versailles.

So Jean and Marie had to part once more, and the young soldier grew anxious, almost terrified, when he thought of his sweetheart left in the insurgent city. Still, he tried to speak cheerfully and not think of what might happen. Marie's words, however, made it impossible to ignore the chief danger. "But there is Monsieur Gruchon," she said.

It was a terrible position, and, as Marie clung to him, weeping, Jean was distracted. The name the gamins had given the usurer—"the old vampire"—came to him in all its forcible meaning. He pictured the man watching and waiting patiently to seize his victim, as soon as her protector should have gone. He fancied he knew why Gruchon was working his way to the front rank of the Communists; if they held the city he would be a leader—a power amongst them, and Marie—how could she escape him!

The girl looked into her lover's face and saw the agony he felt. Her heart reproached her for adding to his trouble, and she wiped away her tears and kissed him.

"Never mind, Jean," she said bravely, "I know you will soon be back, and—yes, when all is peace, we will be——" she finished the sentence with a blush. "And perhaps, after all, the horrid old wretch will forget all about me. You see, it will be all right, dear, and whatever happens, I shall always—always love you."

Marie clung to him.

So Jean went away comforted a little, in spite of his forebodings.

The next day the cannon on Monmartre opened fire, answered by the battery of Mont Valérien. The second siege of Paris had commenced!

For six days the shells shrieked over the city: for six long days Marie, terrified, watched alone at her window; saw the mob of men and wild-looking women stream down the street in the direction of the Boulevards, and, shuddering, saw the dead and wounded carried swiftly past.

Then the rush to the front ceased, for the army of Versailles had entered Paris, and above the shouts and the cries, the young girl heard the sustained firing that told her the soldiers were storming the barricade at the head of the Rue des Martyrs.

Her heart beat with hope. Jean would soon be with her now.

Suddenly a red glare lit up the sky; the Communists were firing the houses!

Marie watched the light spread and grow as the flames ran from roof to roof, from street to street. Night came, but no darkness of night; and below, in the flare and heat, ran women, old and young, all mad, frantic—singing and yelling—hair streaming, red sashes flying, swinging cans of petroleum and blazing torches. One of the furies fell in the mad rush; her oil-saturated dress caught fire; she fled screaming down the street, a living mass of flame. It was a carnival of fiends. An incarnation of horror!

Marie could not look away from the scene, it fascinated her.

Amid the noise she did not hear the door of the room open, and she turned with a cry, as a hand was laid on her shoulder. It was Gruchon, black with powder—red with blood—more hideous than ever.

"You thought you were forgotten, my pretty one," he cried, "but no, I am here to save you. We must leave this place at once."

He went to a cupboard, and taking out one of Martial Buissonière's blouses, put it on. "The army has entered the walls," he continued, pouring water into a pail, and washing his hands and face. "You look hopeful. Gr—r—r, I know; you think of your lover. But he will be too late. I intended to leave my love-making until we were masters of the city, but that dream is over. Only when Monsieur Jean comes he will find the bird gone. Eh, my pretty, we can hide safely till the fighting is done. I know where. I have money, too. I took care to hide that from my dear comrades. Shall we not be happy, my dear?" And he threw his arms around her, and kissed her in spite of her struggles.

"So you bite, do you? You will not have it that it is a good plan? Now, see the consequences of refusing."

He dragged her to the window, and looked down upon the mad crowd.

He dragged her to the window.

"See," he cried, his face lighting up with a devilish enthusiasm. "See the brave girls! See the noble women! They burn the city; they destroy; they kill. Bravo! bravo! Vive la Commune! Les pétroleuses! Les pétroleuses!"

"Heaven protect me," murmured Marie, shuddering as the wild chorus of the Marseillaise reached her ears. "Where is Jean? Where is my father?"

"Your father," growled Gruchon brutally; "in the trench of the first barricade. No fear of his interrupting our love scene. Shall I call them up—les pétroleuses? Would their embraces be softer than mine? Now will you forget your Jean and be my wife? Your promise," he demanded, shaking her savagely by the shoulder, "or into the street, and our she-wolves shall tear you limb from limb."

A yell of execration rose from the men.

"Ah, no. Mercy! Mercy!"

"Which is it to be? Quick."

"My God! Mercy!"

"Yes, then?"

"No, a thousand times, no!" cried Marie in desperation.

Gruchon's face was distorted with rage and disappointed passion.

"Come, then," he shouted, "come; down below to the pétroleuses—to the girls of the torch—come!" and he dragged her to the door and flung it open. A volume of stifling smoke poured into the room, and drove them back. The pétroleuses had fired the house!

Loth to relinquish his prey, Gruchon caught her up in his arms to carry her through the dense clouds that rolled up the stairs, but she clung desperately to the side and posts of the door. In vain he tried to tear her away. He was suffocating.

"Curse you, you will not come?" he yelled at last. "Then stay—and burn, burn, burn!" Flinging her to the ground he slammed the door, locked it, and rushed down the already crackling stairs.

Marie rose, and staggering to the window, threw it open. "Help! help!" she cried.

At that moment, down the street, driving before them the rabble, rushed the soldiers. Jean was with them. He heard the cry, and saw Marie's face at the window. With one bound he was at the door. As he reached it, Gruchon rushed out. Jean recognised him, and, mad with rage, caught him by the throat, hurling him back amongst the soldiers as a rat is thrown to the dogs.

"A Communist!" he cried, and disappeared in the doorway.

A dozen hands seized the denounced man.

"No, no, for God's sake! No! I have nothing to do with them; see, my hands are clean."

A soldier reached over, and catching the collar of his blouse, tore it down with a sudden jerk, showing beneath it—the red sash of the Commune!

A yell of execration rose from the men. "To the barricade," was the cry. The wretched Gruchon, coward at the last, cursing, praying, shrieking, was hurled against the barrier, and as Jean, bearing Marie in his arms, reached the street, there was a rattle of musketry, a scream—and the soldiers swept on.

The Queen against Owen

By Allen Upward

Author of "Secrets of the Courts of Europe," "The Prince of Balkistan," etc., etc.

CHAPTER I.

The Indictment.

"Mynyddshire to Wit.—The jurors for our lady the Queen upon their oath present that Eleanor Margaret Owen, upon the first day of June in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and eighty-nine, feloniously, wilfully, and of her malice aforethought did kill and murder one Ann Elizabeth Lewis against the peace of our lady the Queen, her crown and dignity."

CHAPTER II.

The Brief for the Prosecution.

"A brief for you, sir, for the assizes at Abertaff—the great murder case."

Mr. Prescott looked up as his clerk entered, and heard these words. Then he silently put out his hand and took the brief, while the clerk retired into the outer room of the chambers to make a note of the fee.

Everyone had heard of the great Porthstone murder. Mr. Prescott had followed the papers pretty closely in their accounts of it—the discovery, the proceedings at the inquest, before the magistrates, and so on. The brief did not take him altogether by surprise. He had been intrusted with several important prosecutions before this, and the solicitor representing the Crown in the present case was a personal friend of his own. He had, therefore, all along had expectations of appearing in the case, and his only doubt had been whether, on account of its unusual importance, a Queen's Counsel would be engaged along with him, or whether he would have the charge of the case himself.

It need hardly be added that Mr. Prescott was still a member of the "Junior Bar," that is to say, he had not arrived at the dignity of a Queen's Counsel. But he had been some ten years in the practice of his profession, and occupied a foremost position among the members of the Southern Circuit. Tall, thin, and auburn-haired, with a ruddy complexion, his appearance was rather remarkable among the brethren of the long robe. But he had a pattern lawyer's face, with a firm, decided chin, the pronounced nose and strongly-marked eyebrows characteristic of the race.

Before opening the document in his hand, he took a hasty glance at the outside. It bore the usual endorsement. At the head were the words "Mynyddshire Summer Assizes, Holden at Abertaff, 29th July, 1889."

Then followed the name of the case: "Regina, on the Prosecution of Sergeant Evans, against Eleanor Margaret Owen," and the description of the offence: "For Wilful Murder."

Next came the word "Brief" in very large letters. "For the Prosecution: Mr. Chas. Prescott, 20 guineas."

And a little below, on one side: "With you, Mr. F. J. Pollard." This was a younger man, who was to act as junior to Prescott.

Last of all came the solicitors' name at the foot: "Pollard and Pollard, Abertaff." They were, as may be surmised, relations of the young gentleman who had been favoured with the junior brief.

Mr. Prescott smiled pleasantly at the number of guineas, and sardonically at the name of the counsel whose assistance he was to receive. Then, pulling off the tape, he unfolded the document, and settled down to a study of its contents.

It was headed inside by the same words as appeared in the endorsement, down to "wilful murder." After that it went on to give a copy of the indictment.

Then came the narrative itself:

"Case for the Prosecution.

"In this case the prisoner, Eleanor Margaret Owen, is charged with the wilful murder of Ann Elizabeth Lewis.

Digitized by Google

"The facts of the case are as follows:

"The deceased, Miss Ann Lewis, was a maiden lady, living at Porthstone, in Mynyddshire, a quiet little seaside place about twenty miles from the county town, Abertaff.

"Her only surviving relative was a nephew, John Lewis, who had been for a considerable time in Australia, but, having made some money, returned to England, and arrived at Porthstone on the evening of the first of June.

"The accused, Eleanor Margaret Owen, is an orphan, her father, the late Rector of Porthstone, having died two years ago."

("Poor old Owen! I remember him well," murmured the barrister. "It's well for the poor old chap that he is gone.")

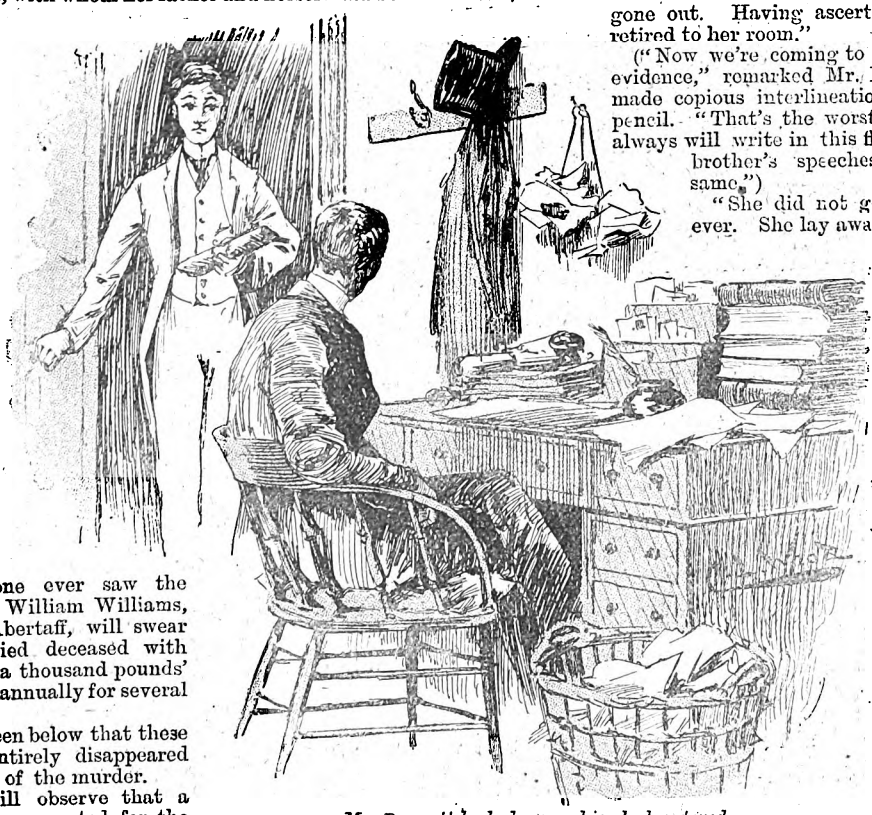
"Immediately on her father's death she went to reside with Miss Lewis, with whom her father and herself had been on friendly terms, in the capacity of a paid companion.

"She was paid £24 a year and had no other means of support; but Rebecca, a servant in the house, will say that she has heard Miss Lewis promised to remember the accused in her will.

"Deceased was rather eccentric in money matters, and invested a large portion of her savings in valuable jewels. No one ever saw the collection; but William Williams, a jeweller, of Abertaff, will swear that he supplied deceased with something like a thousand pounds' worth of jewels annually for several years past.

"It will be seen below that these jewels have entirely disappeared since the night of the murder.

"Counsel will observe that a motive is here suggested for the crime.



Mr. Prescott looked up as his clerk entered.

"On the night of the first of June last Mr. Lewis, deceased's nephew, left the house about ten o'clock and did not return that night.

"Shortly after he was gone deceased was heard to retire by the servants. These are four in number, and consist of a butler or general man, cook, housemaid, and parlourmaid.

"The three women servants went to rest at a quarter-past ten, and the butler at half-past.

"All this time prisoner was downstairs in the drawing-room, where she had spent the evening with deceased and Mr. Lewis.

"About eleven the butler thinks he heard her come upstairs to her bedroom, which adjoined deceased's, with a door of communication between. This door was never locked or bolted.

"An hour afterwards Rebecca, the parlourmaid, woke from sleep, and heard a stifled groan somewhere below. Apparently it proceeded from Miss Lewis's room. She did not waken the housemaid, who sleeps in the same room. She attributed the sound at the time to troubled sleep.

"Shortly afterwards she heard a subdued sound, as if of footsteps going downstairs. She was not alarmed, as she thought she recognised Miss Owen's tread. She, therefore, roused no one, but, inspired by curiosity, got up herself, put on some things, and crept downstairs.

"All the doors were closed as she passed. She listened outside Miss Owen's room, but heard nothing. Just then she thought she heard the front door pulled gently to. She went cautiously down, and discovered that all the bolts had been undone, and the door was fastened simply by the latch.

"Three persons carried a latch-key—Miss Lewis, the butler, and Miss Owen. One of the three had, therefore, gone out. Having ascertained this, she retired to her room."

("Now we're coming to something like evidence," remarked Mr. Prescott, as he made copious interlineations with a blue pencil. "That's the worst of Pollard, he always will write in this florid style. His brother's speeches are just the same.")

"She did not go to sleep, however. She lay awake listening for some time, and then she heard footsteps ascending and going into one of the bedrooms below. Her room was immediately above that of deceased.

"In about ten minutes more, to employ the witness's own expression, the footsteps came out again and descended to the hall for the second time. The parlourmaid now awakened the housemaid, Lucy, who slept in the room with her, and they both sat up and listened intently for some time.

"The footsteps sounded heavier this time; the witnesses describe them as 'thumpy.' Counsel will see that this would be the natural result of someone carrying a heavy load.

"This time neither of the servants made any attempt to follow or observe what was taking place. They say they heard the hall door softly pulled to, but nothing more.

"Shortly afterwards they both fell asleep.

"The same night, about twelve o'clock, a fisherman of the place, named Evan Thomas, was coming up from the beach. He had been doing some night fishing.

"As he got on to the esplanade he observed the figure of a woman walking swiftly away from him in the direction of Newton Bay. He knows prisoner well, and believes it was her he saw.

"There is no further evidence as to what occurred that night.

"In the morning the housemaid Lucy was the first down,

Digitized by Google

as was usually the case. She found the hall door locked and bolted, as the butler left it at half-past ten the night before.

"One of the household, therefore, must have been out, and returned after the witness Rebecca had gone back to her room.

"Putting these facts together, it is clear that the only possible authors of the crime subsequently discovered must have been the butler, who had a latch-key, and prisoner.

"At eight o'clock the witness Rebecca came down and took two jugs of hot water to the ladies' doors. She knocked at each. She heard a faint reply from prisoner, but none from deceased's room.

"At half-past eight prisoner usually came down, and deceased was generally seen a few minutes after.

"On this morning, the second of June, neither of them had appeared by nine o'clock.

"The witness Rebecca then remembered that Miss Lewis had not answered when called, and feared that she had failed to waken her. She therefore went upstairs and knocked again.

"There was no answer. Becoming alarmed, because her mistress was old and had once suffered from some seizure, she went to Miss Owen's door and knocked impatiently.

"Prisoner at once came and opened it. She was completely dressed, and apparently ready to come down.

"The following conversation, or something near it then took place:

"The witness Rebecca began by saying that she had knocked at Miss Lewis's door, but could get no answer. 'Do you know if anything's the matter?' she said.

"Prisoner heard her without any appearance of surprise, and merely answered:

"'No; we had better call to her, and if she doesn't answer, I'll go in.'

"They then went together to the door on the landing, and prisoner called out loudly: 'Miss Lewis! May I come in?'

"There was again no answer. Prisoner then put her hand to the door and turned the handle. The door, however, would not open. It was locked, and the key was inside.

"The only possible access, therefore, was through prisoner's own room.

"It is unnecessary to draw counsel's attention to the gravity of this circumstance."

("Quite unnecessary," said Prescott sarcastically to himself. "Bless my soul, how he piles on the agony!")

"By this time, the other servants in the house had taken the alarm. The butler, John Simons, came on the scene, followed by the cook and housemaid. It was he who now addressed prisoner:

"'We must get in through your room, miss,' he said.

"It may be well to state here, that Simons had lived with the deceased for fifteen years, and was greatly trusted.

"He now went straight into prisoner's bedroom. Prisoner seemed thoroughly alarmed, and ran in after him, the three women coming next.

"As he was about to take hold of the handle of the door opening into Miss Lewis's room, he suddenly beheld a sight that made him reel back. This was a smear of blood on the china handle. The witness Rebecca caught sight of it at the same time, and uttered a loud scream.

"No one noticed the demeanour of the prisoner at the moment of this discovery. But when they had recovered sufficiently to take notice, she was leaning against a chest of drawers, deathly pale."

("Confound the man!" exclaimed the reader, as he came to this sentence. "How he does go on against her! It's enough to make me think her innocent. Poor little Eleanor! It's five years since I saw her. She was a pretty little thing of fifteen then. I wonder what sort of woman she has turned out. Well, well, I must stick to business.")

"Simons quickly recovered his presence of mind. Taking hold of the handle so as to avoid touching the smear, he burst open the door, and rushed in towards the bed.

"The bed was empty.

"It seemed to have been slept in the night before, and the clothes were not much disarranged; but on the lower sheet, close to the bolster, was a large stain of blood.

"The stain was about the size of a cheese-plate, dark in the centre, and fainter round the edge. There was no other trace of violence.

"The room was then searched. All present took part in the search except prisoner, who sat in a chair looking on.

"Deceased's clothes, worn by her the day before, were found in their proper places, negativing the idea that she could have gone away herself. Her nightdress, on the other hand, was missing. This would point to the prisoner's having killed her in her sleep and disposed of the body as it was.

"This was a smear of blood on the china handle."

"No further trace of violence was discovered in the room. The butler then got them all out, and locked both doors on the outside. He then went for the police.

"This was about half-past nine. On his way to the police-station he met Mr. Lewis, deceased's nephew. He stopped him and related the circumstances.

"Mr. Lewis was greatly upset. As soon as he was able to speak he pointed out that the only possible author of the crime was Miss Owen. He turned and accompanied Simons to the police-station.

"At the police-station they found Sergeant James Evans. To him Simons detailed the incidents already described. Mr. Lewis then stepped forward and said:

"'I charge Eleanor Owen with the murder of my aunt,

Digitized by Google

Ann Elizabeth Lewis. I have made some money, and, please God, I'll spend every penny of it rather than my poor aunt shall remain unavenged.'"

("All this is not evidence," muttered the barrister, impatiently scoring out the paragraph with his pencil. "Why does Pollard put in things like this? Perhaps it supplies a clue, though, to his enthusiasm," added Mr. Prescott thoughtfully. "I dare say he's got this Lewis behind him, and is bleeding him pretty freely. That accounts for the figures on my brief, so I oughtn't to complain. But I wish to goodness it were anybody but old Owen's daughter! Why, I can remember kissing her when she was only six years old.")

"Sergeant Evans, who will be called as a witness, now proceeded to the house and made a thorough search. Two important facts were discovered.

"The butler had left the house by the back door, but on returning with Mr. Lewis the party entered by the front. Simons stepped forward with his latch-key to open the door, but found the latch already lifted and stuck fast in its raised position.

"This was a thing which always occurred if the latch was lifted too high. The keyhole is shaped like an inverted T, and the members of the household who carried keys were generally careful not to push them too far upward, lest this result should occur.

"Counsel will probably be inclined to see a sufficient explanation of the incident in the agitation and haste by which a criminal would naturally be overcome just after the commission of such a crime."

("Yes, I suppose so." The barrister paused for some time, knitted his brows, and tried to think the matter out. "Yes, it would be a natural result," he admitted at length, and resumed his reading.)

"The next discovery was equally important.

"Miss Lewis's bedroom window looked over the front garden. Immediately below it, under the dining-room window, was a grating over a window, which gave light to an underground scullery. This grating was surrounded by a bed of shrubs, which concealed it from the eyes of visitors.

"Sergeant Evans's first move was to proceed to the spot. He was rewarded by finding bloodstains on the grating. The nearest shrubs had been roughly handled, and some of their leaves lay scattered about.

"The inference which counsel is asked to draw is that the body—or a portion of it—was lowered down through the window, and thence carried away.

"This would evidently be much easier for a young woman like the prisoner to do than to carry it downstairs.

"Her second journey down, when she appears to have been bearing a load of some kind, may be accounted for by supposing that she returned for the jewels. These, as already stated, have disappeared.

"During deceased's lifetime she maintained great secrecy about these jewels. No one, not even the servants who had been with her longest, seems to have known anything as to their whereabouts.

"It is suggested, therefore, that they were kept by deceased in a secret hiding-place. This secret must have been disclosed to prisoner, or found out by her.

"Probably, had deceased's nephew been home longer, he would have learnt something about the matter.

"Counsel will doubtless have noticed the coincidence of the crime being committed on the very night of Mr. Lewis's return. Probably this was to anticipate any communications between aunt and nephew which might have resulted in his obtaining access to the treasure hoard."

("Coincidence, indeed! Some people might think it a d—— suspicious circumstance," said the reader. Then, shrugging his shoulders, he added: "Of course she's guilty, and it's my duty to get a conviction; but, upon my word, I never had a job to do that I liked less. It's all Pollard's fault for writing up the brief so desperately. He and his Lewis!")

"Sergeant Evans now proceeded to arrest the prisoner. When he charged her with the crime she turned pale and cried out that it was impossible. But she shed no tears, and showed but little emotion after the first surprise."

("Pooh! What difference does that make? This sort of thing depends simply on the person's character, not on whether he is guilty or not." And the blue pencil did some more scoring out.)

"The only remaining circumstance of the case is the disposal of the body.

"In the afternoon of the same day, the second of June, a visitor staying in Porthstone, named Wilfrid Meredith, was walking out to Newton Bay. Just as he rounded the corner and came into the bay he discovered on the edge of the waves a human hand.

"Although somewhat bruised and discoloured, this hand has been identified as the deceased's by her nephew and the servants.

"On the fingers were several valuable rings, which deceased constantly wore. About the identity, therefore, there can be no reasonable doubt.

"No other portion of the body has yet been found. For this reason the Treasury has declined to take up the case, which is in the nature of a private prosecution on the part of Mr. Lewis.

"Call John Lewis."

At this point Mr. Prescott laid down his brief and leant back in his chair. The remainder of the document consisted of the proofs or statements of the evidence which each witness was prepared to give. Much of it would, of course, be merely a repetition of the narrative contained in the first part. It could therefore be looked at some other time.

He laid down his brief, and began to think over its contents. It was a case of circumstantial evidence, evidence which all seemed to point one way, and to fix a horrible crime upon a young girl whom he remembered as a pretty child.

Though not a native of Mynyddshire, Charles Prescott was familiar with the district. He had, in fact, been educated at a grammar school in the next county, and it was while there that he had made the acquaintance of the Owens.

His favourite schoolfellow, a boy a few years younger than himself, came from the little watering-place, and a summer seldom passed without Prescott spending some part of his holiday at his friend's home. There it was that he had seen old Owen, the parish rector, and had caught a few passing glimpses of little Eleanor.

Hence his interest in the present case, and the unusual feeling of reluctance with which he approached his task. He had not been to Porthstone for five years now. The schoolfellows were still friendly—in fact, they saw a good deal of each other still, having taken up the same profession and joined the same circuit. But Prescott had got on much better than his friend. He had had five years' start to begin with, and his was that firm, persevering temperament which insures success to the lawyer. He had, therefore, risen steadily, and was already making an income of twelve or fifteen hundred a year, while his young and erratic friend had but gained a precarious foothold in the profession by dint of a few brilliant speeches, which covered a very superficial acquaintance with the law.

"I wonder who will have the defence," meditated Prescott. "It will surely run to something more than a docker."

A docker, it should be explained, is the name for a retainer which is handed direct from a prisoner in the dock to a counsel, without the intervention of a solicitor. It is the resource of the poorer class of offenders, who can scrape together that single guinea, but no more.

"I have it. I'll go and see Tressamer about this. He goes there still, and ought to know all about it."

Tressamer was the name of his old friend. His chambers were in an adjoining court of the Temple. Prescott put on his hat, told his clerk where he was to be found, and strolled forth.

CHAPTER III.

Counsel for the Defence.

"Mr. Tressamer is inside, sir. Will you walk in?"

Thus said the clerk at Mr. Tressamer's chambers as soon as he saw Mr. Prescott. Then, stepping to the door, he rapped and opened it, saying the visitor's name.

"Well, Tressamer, where have you been this age?"

The speaker stopped, startled at the sight that presented itself, for there, lying on his face on the hearthrug, with his hands clutching at his thick black curls, lay George Tressamer, the very picture of one in mortal despair.

He sprang to his feet as his friend entered, and made an awkward attempt to behave as if he had not been seen.

"Why, Prescott, where do you come from, pray? More excursions to the County Court, with the solicitors on opposite sides racing to you to see which can get his brief into your hands first?"

Prescott thought it best to take the hint, and not remark on his friend's trouble. He quietly answered:

"No; I've not been anywhere. Been in town, preparing for the assizes. By-the-bye——" He paused to look for a chair, and was surprised to find everyone in the room littered with books. He proceeded to clear the nearest to him, lifting the books on to the floor. "I've just had a brief to prosecute—Hullo! 'Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown'! I had no idea you were such a student—in that Porthstone case—the murder——"

Again he stopped short. A look of anguish had come into his friend's face.

"What is it, old man? I can see something's gone wrong."

"Charlie," was the reply, spoken in a tone hardly above a whisper, "are you prosecuting Eleanor Owen?"

Prescott nodded.

"And have you read your brief?"

"I've just come from it."

"Then you can understand how I feel. I am defending her—and I love her!"

He threw all the energy of his passionate nature into the last sentence, and then sank down upon the window seat, and hid his face with his hands.

For several minutes neither spoke. Prescott hardly knew what course to take. To offer to resign his brief might be to let it pass into the hands of one who would share Mr. Pollard's prejudice against the accused. On the other hand, to retain it, unless he were prepared to bring the case fully home to the prisoner, would be alike a breach of professional honour and an act of dishonesty. He resolved at last to leave the choice to his friend.

"George," he said.

The other slowly lifted his head. Looking upon that face, his friend could see the marks of the terrible experience he was passing through. Tressamer had always been a youth of wild and stormy emotions; no man less calm and steadfast than Prescott could have maintained a friendship so long with such a nature. But now he was struggling with passions compared with which the emotions of schoolboys were as nothing.

"George, what shall I do? I want you to decide. You know me too well to think I care about the little benefit to myself when it's a case of life and death with a friend like you. Shall I chuck up the case?"

Tressamer gazed at him gratefully at first, and then with a hesitating, pondering look. Finally he said:

"You have read your brief, and, of course, you know the worst. Tell me, what do you think, honestly?"

"Honestly, George, I see no defence. There is no doubt the old woman has been murdered. I don't see how it could have been done by anyone outside the house; and then there is the blood on the door-handle. I may tell you that, even before I knew how you stood, in reading the brief I felt a sort of hesitation—that is, I couldn't get that feeling of confidence that one generally has in one's case when the evidence is clear. I felt as if I shouldn't put much heart into the prosecution. But, still, I don't see what defence there is."

Tressamer listened in silence and let a moment or two go by before he gave his decision.

"I would rather you kept your brief. I would rather you did it. After all, you have merely a mechanical part to perform—it is only routine. Suppose I were to have a limb amputated, I should like it to be done by a man I knew. And this is something of the same sort. The evidence is there, and you will not make it any worse—or better."

The other was shocked at the gloomy, resigned way in which he spoke.

"Good heavens! You don't mean that you, too, believe——"

"No, Charles; I believe she is innocent. But I do not expect her innocence will ever be proved in this world!"

"Oh, come, you mustn't give up now! All sorts of things may happen. The trial may go differently to what you expect. Half the time these witnesses don't swear up to their proofs."

"They have given their evidence twice already—at the inquest and before the magistrates."

"Yes, but then they weren't cross-examined. It is very different when they have a man like you to turn them inside out. You are not nervous about it, are you?"

"Nervous!" He smiled grimly. "No. It was at my own request I received this brief. A breach of etiquette, you see"—with another heavy smile. "If she can be saved I shall save her. Shall I tell you my defence?"

"No, don't; I would rather be taken by surprise. I don't want to shine in this case, Heaven knows! Take every advantage I can fairly give you. I know you don't expect more."

"Thank you," was the answer.

There was a little pause, during which neither spoke. At last, returning to the only topic in either mind, Tressamer observed:

"I have been deep in this ever since it occurred. I have been running up and down to Porthstone. I was at the inquest and in the police-court, but I thought it best to do nothing, and let the public think she was undefended. It may soften their feelings towards her. All these little things have to be thought of."

"Yes; don't you remember that famous Shepherdsbury case? The man who acted for the prisoner—the solicitor, I think it was—made such a brilliant fight in the police-court that the magistrates hesitated to commit; but the result was that the Crown knew all about the defence, and when the real trial came, the man hadn't a chance. Always reserve your defence."

"Yes; but you forget, the solicitor has got a splendid practice through it," was the bitter answer. "Few men in the West of England are doing better in that class of business. Did you know—but of course you didn't—that I was down at Porthstone only two days before the thing happened?"

"No; were you?"

"Yes; and I was staying in Abertaff that very night. I intended coming up to town the first thing in the morning, but something detained me, and in a few hours the news arrived. So I went down at once, saw Eleanor at the police-station, and advised her what to do before any of those meddling Pollards got at her."

"Pollards? Why, they are briefing me for the prosecution!"

"Yes, I know. Pollard conducted it in the police-court. At the inquest he represented that man Lewis, the nephew, and very bitter he was, too. But I made Eleanor choke him off before that. Wouldn't have him at any price. I have got a quiet old chap in Abertaff now who won't interfere—old Morgan."

"Do you know, I thought he was trying to press the case rather in my brief. This accounts for it. But what sort of a man is this Lewis?"

"Oh, a big, coarse-looking fellow. Came back from Australia just before it happened. A brute! He's egging on the Crown. She left him all her money—about twenty thousand—but the jewels are supposed to be worth nearly as much more, and he's lost them, and so he's savage."

"I say, George, I don't know that I ought to say it, but has it occurred to you as at all curious that he should have returned the very night it was done?"

A gleam of furtive joy crossed the other's face, and instantly vanished again.

"Has that struck you?" he said, and seemed about to add something more. But he restrained himself, and merely added: "The less you and I talk about it the better, perhaps. Coming out?"

And they left the chambers together.

But though Tressamer ceased to discuss the subject with his friend, he could not dismiss it from his mind. The sparkling wit, the wild, extravagant humour, for which he had been famous, seemed to have withered up in the furnace of his terrible grief. He lunched with Prescott in almost dead silence, and as soon as it was over got up hurriedly and disappeared.

She was sitting in a dull, stony apathy.

He had truthfully described himself as having been deep in the case from its commencement. When the news of what had happened at Porthstone reached the town of Abertaff he was walking in the High Street alone. He saw the unusual excitement, and meeting an acquaintance, learnt from him that Miss Lewis had been murdered.

"And they say it was done by her companion, a girl named Owen," added the man.

Tressamer turned white, gasped for breath, and cried out loudly:

"It's a lie! I swear she is innocent!"

In another moment he had darted off to a cab-stand, and was on his way to the station.

There he had one of those sickening waits for a train which are inevitable on such occasions. Twice he was on the point of ordering a special, but each time he restrained himself by the thought that by the time it was ready the ordinary train would be nearly due. He shunned the gloomy waiting-room, and strode up and down the narrow platform, with swift, excited strides.

The porters and newspaper-boys stared as he rushed to and fro, hardly heeding the piles of luggage with which railway servants seek to break the dull monotony of a platform promenade. There was French blood in Tressamer: short, dark, thick-necked, yet far from stout in figure, he possessed the strain of sombre passion which runs through the blood of the Celtic races. He could no more control himself in deference to the officials of Abertaff Station than a madman, when his frenzy is on him, can conceal it from his keepers.

At last the train drew up. He sprang into a carriage, and impatiently endured the journey down to the sea-side. Arrived there, he proceeded instantly to the police-station, and demanded an interview with Miss Owen.

At first there was some difficulty with the police officials, but Tressamer was not to be checked.

"I am her legal adviser," he announced. "I am a member of the Bar, and I consider it of vital importance that I should see the prisoner at once. If you refuse, I shall wire straight to the Home Office."

This threat produced its natural effect. The police, in doubt as to their powers, gave way, and he was taken into the cell where Eleanor had been secured.

If Eleanor had not wept when she was accused of the terrible crime, neither was she weeping now. She was sitting in a dull, stony apathy, from which she was hardly aroused by the sound of the barrister's familiar name. She looked up, it is true, and gazed at him with lack-lustre eyes. But she uttered no word.

He, on his part, waited till the constable had withdrawn. Then he advanced a step from the door, and said:

"Eleanor, you are innocent. Will you let me save you?"

Then at last the light came into her eyes. Then at last the unnatural stiffness faded out of her frame. Then at last the awful coldness loosed its hold of her heart, and answering, "George, I do not deserve your help," she gave way to a tempest of tears.

He waited till the storm had spent its first fury. Every shade of anguish passed across his face meanwhile. But he strove to master his feelings, and to put a commonplace expression into his voice, as he said at length:

"I have been in Abertaff the last two days—since I left you." His voice trembled an instant, but he went on: "I heard the news this morning, and came down at once. I want to defend you. I want you to accept my services as a token that you still look on me as a friend, in spite of all that has happened."

"I don't know how to answer you," she murmured. "The more generous you are, the more ashamed I feel. I ought not to take your help. And yet you are the only creature in the world who has not forsaken me."

"Don't say that, Eleanor. No one else knows you as I do. No one else feels for you—but I won't say anything about that. One stipulation I must make. You are not to thank me—not one word."

And with a stern gesture he waved her off, as she made a movement as if to throw herself at his feet.

"But you must forgive me," she said. "Whether I am as wicked as you told me I was when we parted or not, you must tell me that you take me for what I am, that you expect no change in me." She paused a moment, and then cried out with sudden vehemence: "Oh, I have done you injustice! I didn't know how noble you could be! But it is too late; I cannot alter now."

An angry throb convulsed the man during her first words. At the end he ground his teeth and clenched his hands together.

"Silence, Eleanor! If you speak to me like that again I shall go. There are to be no thanks, no praises. Never refer to the past. I know you and understand. If I cannot tear all hope out of my heart, what is that to you? I ask nothing, and will take nothing unless it is freely given."

He ceased, and she looked at him with a mixture of gratitude and fear.

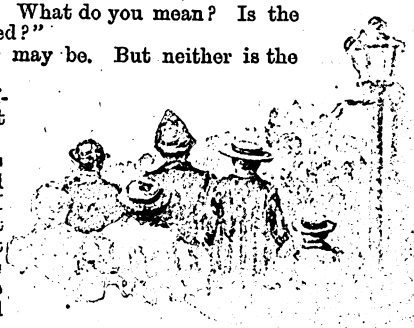
Then he referred to her dreadful situation.

"I needn't tell you, Eleanor, that as your counsel you must confide in me fully. I have heard the story so far as it is public, and up to now I may tell you that, as a matter of law, you are in no real danger."

Eleanor stared at him.

"In no danger? What do you mean? Is the murderer discovered?"

"No, and never may be. But neither is the body."



"Why, what difference does that make?"

"Don't you know?" answered the barrister. "I thought most people knew that till the body was discovered no one could be convicted of murder."

A ray of hope shone out in the prisoner's face.

"Then do you mean that Miss Lewis may be alive still?" she asked quickly.

"No, no. Nobody doubts that she is dead, or that someone has killed her. But the point is this, that you cannot be legally tried and convicted. The body has disappeared."

The heavy shade of despair settled down once more.

"What good is that?" she answered reproachfully. "If they believe me guilty it makes it worse for me, because I can never be acquitted. I shall be suspected till I die. Oh, I would rather suffer death, I think."

"Hush, hush!" he exclaimed, shocked and agitated. "Listen to me and try to bear it as best you can. The evidence against you is simply overwhelming. Probably I am the only man in the world who believes in your innocence."

"Except the murderer," she interrupted.

"Except the murderer, of course. But what I want to say is this—as things stand now no jury that ever breathed would acquit you. Only a miracle can reveal the truth. But what I can do, and mean to do, for you is to save you on the ground I have told you of. You must expect nothing more."

"George, it will kill me. Alone, hated, abhorred, what use would my life be to me when the whole world believed me guilty? No, I will pray for a miracle; but if not——" She stopped and panted in anguish of soul.

Her suffering was reflected on the man's face.

"Don't—don't talk like that!" he cried. "Remember, there will be always one who trusts you, one who reveres you, loves you! I don't mean to ask anything. I would not speak to you like this if I could help it; but remember, if the worst comes to the worst, you have always one friend to turn to, one man who asks no higher joy than to pass his life with you, whether here or in some far-off country, and devote himself to soothing your distress."

While he was unfolding these views a sudden misgiving entered Eleanor's mind. Rising up, she crossed the cell to where he sat, and, laying her hands on his shoulders, she gazed full into his eyes.

"George," she uttered in solemn tones, "I adjure you to tell me the truth. Do you really believe me innocent?"

"Before God I do!" burst out his answer as he looked her in the face.

She was satisfied, and returned to her seat.

"And now," said Tressamer, assuming a more lawyer-like tone, "tell me all that occurred that night."

A long conversation followed, of which the barrister took copious notes in his pocket-book. It was late in the afternoon when he came out of the cell, and went to secure accommodation in Porthstone for the night.

"Lost! She is lost!"

His step was slow, his head drooping, as he came along the esplanade. Suddenly he saw in front of him a concourse of people following a policeman, who held something in his hand, and a gentleman dressed in the unmistakable garb which proclaims the sea-side visitor.

As the crowd came on, Tressamer noticed that this gentleman appeared much agitated. Even the constable's face betrayed an excitement unusual among his kind. But it never occurred to the barrister that this excitement could be connected in any way with the case in which he was so deeply concerned. He took a closer glance at what the policeman was carrying, and then, to his horror, perceived that it was a human hand, the fingers still gay with precious rings. The next moment they all came up to where he was, and he heard someone in the crowd saying:

"That's the hand of the woman that was murdered. A gentleman has just found it in Newton Bay."

The fearful truth burst upon him like a thunderclap. The blood forsook his veins; he staggered helplessly to the nearest seat and sank down upon it, moaning to himself:

"Lost! She is lost!"

The firm ground on which he had been standing had crumbled all at once. The law point on which he had relied to save Eleanor's life, in spite of the crushing weight of evidence against her, was robbed by this accidental discovery of more than half its strength. Who could any longer pretend to doubt that a murder had been committed? Hence Tressamer's despair. Coupled with what Eleanor had said to him in their interview, however, it drove him to seek more earnestly than he otherwise would have done for some theory of defence upon the facts, some means whereby, if possible, to force a doubt into the minds of the jury, and wring from them a verdict of acquittal.

To this task he now devoted himself. He assumed the part of a detective rather than a barrister. In the case of an ordinary client conduct such as this would not have been tolerated for a moment by the rigid etiquette of the Bar; but where a case is of such a nature that the barrister is personally concerned, and where he acts as a private individual pursuing his own interests, etiquette has nothing to say. In joining the Bar, a man does not cease to be a citizen, and to enjoy the rights and privileges of ordinary mortals. It is only in his professional character that his acts come under that rigid supervision which is at once the dread and envy of inferior professions.

But, in any event, George Tressamer's present mood would not have let him give much weight to considerations of such a character. Too much was at stake. He had to keep in constant communication with Eleanor, to encourage her in face of the ordeals of the coroner and the magistrates, and to protect her from the zeal of the various graduates of the Incorporated Law Society who were thirsting to win glory in her defence.

As a blind to the public, he caused the rumour to be spread that she was without professional advice. This idea was confirmed when it got to be known that she had refused the services of Messrs. Pollard and other gentlemen of the neighbourhood.

Meanwhile Tressamer was enabled to go about with less publicity, and to pursue his inquiries. Eleanor was disposed to wonder at him for not employing a detective. But he soon explained that.

"I know detectives," he said to her. "I have seen them in the witness-box and out of it. They are admirable men in their own groove. Give them an ordinary crime—a robbery or a forgery—and they can grapple with it. They will track the defaulting cashier to America for you, or run down the absconding broker in the depths of the Australian Bush. But there their usefulness ends. They are no good in the face of a real mystery like this. This is not a question of clever detection; it is a case of reading the human heart and penetrating its motives. A genius could help us, but I know of no genius in Scotland Yard. No, I will do what I can; and if I come to anything in the way of ordinary detective work, I will send for Sergeant Wright."

So he continued to work alone. He had by this time seen and talked with every witness whose name appeared in the brief for the Crown. He had been present, with the air of a casual spectator, at the inquest, and afterwards at the inquiry before the magistrates, which ended in the committal of Eleanor to the assizes to take her trial for wilful murder.

He did not tell Eleanor much as to the results of his inquiries. He would simply mention that he had been talking to Simons, or that he had had a game of billiards with John Lewis, and she had to form her own idea of what had passed between them.

Finally, he went up to London and plunged into that minute study of Hale and Hawkins which had awakened the surprise of his friend Prescott. He was thus kept occupied till both he and his friend were summoned down from town by the approach of the assizes.

THE GUILTY HANDS

By

DEREK VANE

Author of "The Sin and the Woman," "The Spell of Delilah," "Sentenced," etc., etc.

My own affairs have little to do with this story, so it will be sufficient to say that I am a well-known private detective, and that on May 22nd, 18—, I was seated in a first-class compartment of the express train leaving Marseilles at 10.30 a.m., due at Monte Carlo about four o'clock.

I had travelled through from London, breaking the journey only at Paris and Marseilles, at each of which places I had stayed one night. I had been sent out by the friends of a young man who had got into bad hands at that lovely little nest of wickedness on the Mediterranean to which I was bound, and though the matter was important, it was not urgent enough for there to be any necessity for me to go without my night's rest, so I had done the journey comfortably.

It was a corridor train with a dining-car attached, and being so late in the year it was half empty. No one was going South; everyone had come or was coming home as fast as they could. London and Paris were more attractive now than the Riviera. In my compartment, beside myself, there were only a young French lady and her maid, and they occupied the two corner seats on my left. I sat in a right-hand corner with my back to the engine, next to the little corridor which ran alongside of the carriages. The door of my compartment was wide open, as was the door of most others, for the day was very warm and we were glad to get as much air as we could. The window in the corridor, which faced my door, was open too, and I was looking idly out of it, for, unfortunately, I cannot read much in the train, so that I am apt to find the time drag somewhat on a railway journey unless I light upon a congenial companion. And up to the present time—about twelve o'clock—I had not exchanged a word with anyone except the conductor.

My companions—the lady and her maid—had entered the train, as I did, at Marseilles, and came into my compartment a few moments after I had taken my place. I had seen them standing on the platform at Marseilles, and had casually admired the young lady's appearance and her general attire which, while eminently suited for travelling, was at the same time very tasteful and becoming. She was a slender, fairy-like creature, with a mass of pale yellow hair coiled at the back of her little head, and her eyes, which I met once or twice when she glanced shyly at me, were clear and blue as a child's. There was a look of delicacy about her which excited my sympathy and added to her interesting appearance, and I should by no means have objected to a little conversation with so attractive a neighbour.

But, as she scarcely volunteered a remark, even to her maid, and lay back in her seat with her eyes half closed nearly the whole time, there seemed little chance of my wish being gratified. The maid was a great contrast to her mistress, being a big-boned Frenchwoman, with a dull, rather stupid face.

I had been asked by the steward whether I would go to the first or second déjeuner and had taken my ticket for the second, as had likewise my companions. I had watched the little crowd, who were going in to the first breakfast, hurrying past our door on their way to the dining-car, thinking that they looked as eager as though they had fasted for a week—but a meal certainly makes an agreeable diversion on a journey—and my eyes were wandering back to the window again, when I saw something that, for a moment, paralysed me with horror and surprise.

I have not mentioned that on each side of the window in the corridor was a long, narrow strip of looking-glass, and as I lay back in my corner I could just see the head of a gentleman in the adjoining compartment reflected in one of these strips. It was the head of an elderly man of stout build. I should say, for the thin hair was nearly grey, and the face was rather full and puffy. The once or twice when my eyes had wandered away from the scenery to the looking-glass, I had noticed that he seemed to be dozing most of the time, leaning back in his corner, his head reclining against the cushions.

It could not have been more than a minute after the first lot of passengers had gone past to breakfast that my eyes fell on the strip of looking-glass, and instead of my elderly neighbour reposing quietly in his corner, I was horrified to see his head pushed back by two hands that were pressing a white handkerchief over his mouth and nostrils. The tell-tale glass just reflected the head and hands, that was all, and I instinctively noticed that the latter were very white and shapely—delicate, nervous-looking hands they were, with unusually long fingers.

The next moment I had recovered my senses and started up with a loud exclamation. I was about to rush out to my neighbour's assistance, convinced that something was wrong, when I heard a little scream from the pretty girl in the corner.

"What is it? What has happened?" she cried, clutching my arm. "You look so dreadful. Are you ill? Why did you call out like that?" Her face reflected the scare in my own, and she was trembling violently.

I shook her off without a word, for there was no time to lose, and I should have been in the corridor the next moment, but the door was blocked by the portly person of the lady's maid, who had jumped up to see what was the matter. As I was about to push her away with scant ceremony, a man rushed past and was gone like a flash of lightning. I had just time to see that he was tall and slight and wore a black silk mask, and that was all. I called out for the conductor and hurried into the next compartment, thinking I might be most needed there.

As I entered I was met by a strong smell of chloroform, which almost overcame me for a moment, and looking round I saw that the carriage was empty with the exception of the elderly gentleman, who lay back motionless in his corner with the handkerchief still over his face. I snatched it off, and just at that moment one of the officials, who had been attracted by my cries, hurried up. Fortunately my French is pretty fluent, or I might have found myself in rather an awkward predicament.

"This gentleman has been drugged," I said. "See if there is a doctor in the train, and bring him here at once. And send someone to look for the man who did it. He rushed past just now with a black mask over his face."

The man stared at me for a moment, as though he thought I had taken leave of my senses, and certainly it seemed strange enough that such a thing should have happened almost publicly in broad daylight; but when he would have questioned me I waved him impatiently away. I did what little I could for the victim of the outrage, laying him down on the seat and loosening his collar, but he remained completely unconscious, breathing in a heavy, stertorous fashion. As I was bending over him I felt a light touch on my arm.

"What is it? Is he dead?" asked a woman's voice in a terrified whisper, and looking up, I saw my fair companion from the next carriage. The stolid figure of the maid stood a little way off in the corridor, her heavy features showing nothing more than a little curiosity and excitement, but the delicate girl at my side was trembling almost convulsively, and her face was deathly pale.

"This is no place for you," I said gently, and I added sternly to the maid: "Don't you see that your mistress is ill? Take her away at once. You ought never to have let her come."

"I couldn't stop her," the woman muttered sulkily, but she put her arm round the little trembling figure and led her gently away.

Fortunately there was a doctor among the passengers, and he made his appearance on the scene in less than five minutes. A little crowd began to gather, for, of course, by this time a rumour of something wrong had gone round the train, but he would not permit anyone to remain in the carriage but one of the officials and myself, and shutting the door he proceeded to make an examination of his patient.

"Has the villain been caught?" I asked in a low tone of the conductor.

He shook his head.

"We found an overcoat lying in the corridor, but that is all. It is a mystery what can have become of the man. All the carriages have been searched, but most of the passengers were at breakfast, and nothing at all suspicious has been found. Nobody seems to have noticed anything unusual, or seen any man running away."

"But he must be close at hand," I said impatiently. "He could hardly have jumped off with the train going at express speed. You gave the alarm less than five minutes after I called out. The man's appearance must have betrayed him."

"It doesn't appear to have done so," he retorted drily. "He must be a daring scoundrel to have planned such a thing, and no doubt he had everything ready and didn't waste a moment. I dare say he is laughing in his sleeve at us all now."

"There's nothing to be done here," interrupted the doctor. "Judging from this unfortunate gentleman's appearance, I should say he had a weak heart, and the chloroform, combined with the shock of such an attack, would have been more than sufficient to kill him. Perhaps his assailant did not mean to commit murder, but he has certainly done so."

"What is it?" she cried.

"It does seem so dreadful."

"Why do you fancy he might not have meant it?" I asked.

He picked up a pocket-book from the seat, which had evidently been torn open and the contents rifled.

"This looks more like robbery," he said. "I expect the man who did it was after a big sum of money, and used the anæsthetic as being the simplest way of getting it quietly."

I felt annoyed—perhaps not unnaturally. Firstly, a little delay, owing to my fellow-travellers being of the excitable female sex, had prevented me from catching the criminal, as I certainly ought to have done; and, secondly, the pocket-book had escaped my own observation, and no one likes being put right in his own business.

"Was anyone in the carriage with this gentleman?" I asked the conductor.

"He has been alone for the last ten minutes, since we left Toulon. Before that there were two ladies," he replied.

"Did they know him?"

"I should say not. I did not see them exchange a word."

The compartment on the other side was empty. Altogether there seemed a complete absence of clue.

The train was stopped at the next place of importance, the station-master summoned, and put in possession of all the facts, as far as we knew them. He took charge of the dead man, and when I and the doctor, as well as my fellow-traveller and her maid (who had also seen the man rush past, but were unable to add anything to my description), had given our names and addresses, the train was allowed to go on its way. I confided my profession privately to the station-master, telling him that I should consider it a favour if he would let me know if he discovered anything bearing on the mystery, and he obligingly promised to do so. And so we started, uncomfortably conscious that most probably we carried a murderer in our midst, although there did not seem the faintest chance of our discovering him.

Various suggestions had been made, of course. Someone proposed that every passenger should be searched, and so the contents of the pocket-book might be discovered; but the suggestion was neither feasible nor likely to lead to anything could it be carried out; for supposing the thief carried the spoils on his person, who could say what had been the murdered man's property and what was his own? A few inclined to the belief that the guilty person must have dropped off the train immediately after committing the deed—such things had been done before, even from an express train—and it seemed impossible that the murderer could have preserved his composure and calmness at such a time; surely he would have done something which would have betrayed him. With my larger experience, I was not so certain of this. I had seen more than one villain look innocent and unconcerned under very trying circumstances, and once safely back in his place, this man would have little to fear. In any case, I thought that if he had sought safety by jumping off the train, he ought to be found somewhere along the line; it would be a miracle if he had escaped death in such a leap.

I was shocked to see how much the tragic occurrence had upset my fair companion. She remained some time in a half-fainting condition, and seemed to be afraid to be left alone. Her maid endeavoured to soothe her in an awkward way, but I could not but feel gratified that she seemed to turn more to me for comfort and sympathy. This terrible affair had broken down all reserve, and she talked to me freely.

"It seems so dreadful," she said with a shudder, "that the poor man should have been killed so close to us, and perhaps nothing would have been known about it for ever so long if you had not happened to look in the glass. How strange that you should have just seen the struggle! Who would have thought of such a thing?"

"Certainly not the murderer," I said, with a grim laugh. "And if I hadn't called out and startled you—and I ought to have had more self-control—he wouldn't have escaped me. But I was quite knocked over for the moment, the whole thing was so sudden and terrible."

"And there seems no chance of finding him now. How horrible to think of his being close by, perhaps!" And she looked slowly round with frightened eyes. It was evident that her nerves were quite upset.

"You mustn't think any more about it," I said firmly, "or you will make yourself quite ill. At present certainly there seems no clue. The overcoat, which he had evidently worn as a disguise, is like a hundred others, and does not even bear the maker's name. But the police may get him yet. There is often a curious fate about these things."

She shuddered again violently, and clasped her hands to her eyes. "I shall never forget that old man's face," she murmured. "I wish I could get away from it all. I can hardly sit still."

"Are you going far?" I asked sympathetically.

"To Monte Carlo. My brother is there already, and I am going to him. I have been ordered South for my health; I am not very strong." There was a pathetic drop in her voice as she said this.

"Is it not rather late for the Riviera?" I asked for want of something better to say.

"Not for me. I can stand any amount of heat," smiling faintly.

The steward came just then to say that the second déjeuner was served, and I got up quickly' feeling that I should be all the better for a good meal after the excitement of the last hour.

"You are coming, are you not?" I asked my companion, seeing that she did not move.

"Oh, no, I couldn't!" with a look of apprehension. "I couldn't! It would be too horrible."

"But," I said, a little surprised at such excessive sensitiveness, "I really think you ought to eat something. It would do you good. I suppose it seems a little unfeeling to sit down quietly to a meal after such an event, but it won't do the poor fellow who is dead any good our staying away. Let me persuade you."

"Oh, no, indeed, I would rather not," she said again with considerable agitation, and, seeing how much the idea seemed to upset her, I did not urge it any more. "My maid will bring me some wine and biscuits here. That is all I want."

I was rather surprised on our arrival at Monte Carlo not to see someone waiting to meet her at the station.

"My brother is such a dreadful gambler," she said with a faint smile, "that I dare say he has forgotten all about me. I expect he is sitting in the Casino at the present moment."

She got into a hotel omnibus with her maid, and shook hands with me on parting.

"If you are staying here any length of time, we are sure to meet again," she said. "You will go to the Rooms, like everybody else, I suppose; so I won't say good-bye, but au revoir!"

I walked up to the Victoria Hotel, where I intended staying, leaving my luggage to follow, and when I had removed the dust of the journey and made myself presentable, I sauntered down to the Hôtel de Paris, where the prodigal son, whom I hoped to bring to his senses, had taken up his abode.

I had never been at Monte Carlo out of the season before, and the generally deserted aspect of the place struck me strangely. The empty benches in the Casino Square; the solitary figures that mounted the steps to the famous gambling-rooms, instead of the gay crowds I had been accustomed to see, were rather depressing. I knew that the men and women who were here now were mostly either inveterate gamblers, who preferred playing in the "off" season, when they had the tables more or less to themselves, or unfortunate creatures who had lost all they had, and were either ashamed to return home or lingered on in the hope of being able to retrieve their shattered fortunes by some lucky coup.

A gentleman was sitting next to her.

I was fortunate enough to find the prodigal alone in his own room, and agreeably surprised to see that he was in a subdued and penitent mood, and evidently heartily sick of the place and all its belongings, though his pride would not let him acknowledge as much. However, by handling him gently and carefully, I extracted a promise from him that he would leave for England as soon as he had settled one or two things. By this I understood that he was not going to be driven home like a naughty boy, but that he would be very glad to go as soon as he had a decent excuse for doing so, particularly as I reassured him on the score of the paternal reception. It was settled before we parted that he should leave in a couple of days, but, of course, I meant to stay and see that he did, as in such cases it is not wise to run any risks.

After dinner I sauntered down to the Casino, thinking I might as well go there as any where else, and duty and inclination both leading me in the same direction, I felt that I ought to see whether my charge would keep away from the tables, as he had promised me he would, and I was also not averse to a possible meeting with my fair travelling companion. However, though I stayed until nearly closing time, I saw nothing of her, and I concluded she was probably too exhausted to leave the hotel; but I did not see my charge either, which was more satisfactory. I looked idly at the few players, who were seated at the roulette and trente-et-quarante tables, but could not make up my mind whether any one of them might be the brother who was so fond of gambling. There was no one in the least like her, and the play generally was of a very mild and unexciting description, so that I was not sorry when the evening came to an end.

I had a few lines from the station-master the next day, saying he had heard that the murdered gentleman was a native of Paris, and that he had had a large sum of money with him, intending to try his luck at the gaming tables at Monte Carlo. No money had been found, and it was therefore presumed that it had been kept in the pocket-book which the murderer had rifled.

That same night, which was to be my last in the Principality, I went into the Rooms again, and at one of the roulette tables, I saw my pretty friend. She looked up, and, meeting my glance, bowed graciously, but rather distantly, I thought; so that I did not feel encouraged to go round and speak to her, particularly as she had a pencil and card before her, and was evidently calculating the chances of the game. Perhaps I should have an opportunity later on, so I waited on the opposite side of the table just behind the croupier's chair, idly looking on.

A gentleman was sitting next to her, and presently he took up her card and made some remark, which I was too far off to hear. She nodded her head in reply, but she looked a little startled, I thought, and he put a bank-note down on the single number five and another on eight. He drew his lips in a little with that peculiar tense, almost breathless, expression of the gambler who is risking more than he can afford, and his eyes were glued to the little ivory ball as it was spun round.

The croupier gave the usual warning: "Rien ne va plus," as the fateful ball began to tumble about, and eventually it rolled into 5.

A pale look of excitement crossed the man's face, and, drawing a deep breath, he turned to his companion.

She smiled faintly, but seemed nervous and ill at ease. The croupier was dealing out the winnings now, and with his little rake pushed a pile of gold and notes towards the lucky player who had staked on No. 5, while greedy, envious eyes looked on from round the table.

With an eager movement the man stretched out his hands to take the money, and for a moment they both lay, white and conspicuous, on the green cloth. I looked at them carelessly, and then in a flash something went through me. I almost gasped for breath. Here was the perpetrator of the tragedy in the train!

I knew it; I was convinced I had discovered the truth—as sometimes, by a sudden intuition, we do know things, though our reasons might not be always considered sufficient in a court of law. But I could swear to those hands anywhere—white and supple and blue-veined. I seemed to see them again pressing the handkerchief to the face of the helpless victim! He was about the height and figure, too, of the murderer.

"He's dead," she said.

I was still absorbed in my discovery, still watching, fascinated, those long-fingered, nervous hands as they sorted the money, when I suddenly looked up—as though someone were watching me—and found my acquaintance of the train regarding me with a fixed, suspicious gaze. Directly her eyes met mine she smiled and nodded, as though asking me to rejoice at their good fortune; but I had seen the first look, and I did not feel quite comfortable.

This woman was something quite different from what I had imagined. She had been clever enough to hoodwink me once; what was she going to do now?

I did not move, but stood quietly watching the play, as though nothing had happened. But I knew instinctively that I had put her on her guard, and that, under cover of the game, she was observing my every movement. What should I do? That was what I was trying to decide, and I could not arrive at any very satisfactory conclusion.

For me to attempt to arrest either one or the other was, of course, quite out of the question. The only thing I could do was to lay my information—which to a stranger might appear more suspicion than knowledge—before the proper authorities, and leave them to act. It was getting late now, so I thought I could saunter off to another table and so gradually make my way out without exciting suspicion

This I did, and as soon as I got outside I hurried off to make my suspicions known to the police.

They were sceptical at first, and inclined to pooh-pooh the idea (I think a little natural jealousy that a foreigner should have made such an important discovery partly accounted for this), but at length I induced them to treat the matter more seriously, and before I left they had agreed to take all necessary precautions to prevent the escape of the suspected persons.

But it was too late. The birds were already flown.

We discovered that they must have left the Casino a few minutes after I did, and, hastening back to their hotel, had taken their luggage and been driven to the station in time to catch the night mail to Paris. But they must have got out somewhere in the early morning, before a telegram could be dispatched to stop them, for nothing was seen of them at any of the stations to which information was sent, and no one knew anything about them. They had completely disappeared. They had plenty of money—I heard that they carried off about £500 from the tables that night—so that there was nothing to prevent them from making good their escape.

Of course, it was not really my business, though I felt annoyed at such a failure, and I did not forget it at once, even when I found myself back in my old quarters in London, having brought my own mission to a satisfactory conclusion.

It was six years later, when it had almost faded from my memory, that I learnt the end of the story, and was able to clear up what I had hitherto regarded as an inexplicable mystery.

I had been engaged on a little business in Soho, and my researches brought me into contact with a Frenchwoman, who led a very curious life under cover of the pleasing art of dancing. I should not have recognised her, but she recognised me. Probably I had changed less than she had. It would have been difficult in this shabby prettiness to find the dainty ethereal creature, who had been my companion on that memorable journey to Monte Carlo. It was evident that she had known hard times since then.

When we had exchanged a few remarks, I inquired after her former companion.

"He's dead," she said, "so you can't do any harm to him or to me. Do you think I should have been such a fool as to speak otherwise?"

"If that is the case," I replied, "perhaps you won't mind explaining one or two things that have always puzzled me. I should like to know how you managed that little affair at Monte Carlo?"

"Well, you're a pretty cool hand!" she said with a laugh, after glaring at me a moment. "But I don't mind obliging you: it is all the same to me now. What do you want to know?"

"Who was the murderer, and how did he manage to escape?"

"The murderer—as you politely call him—was a gentleman," she retorted insolently, "and he made the old man's acquaintance in Paris, and found out that he was going to try his luck at Monte Carlo. So, Henri—who was very short just then—thought he saw a chance of doing something for himself. He managed the old man capitally and found out all he wanted. He didn't mean to murder him; that was his own fault for being knocked over by a few whiffs of chloroform."

"And what part did you play in the performance?" I asked.

"Oh, I and the other woman were little more than spectators," she replied. "I don't think you could make us out to be accomplices. We merely took our place in the carriage with you to get in the way, if necessary—and in that I think we succeeded," she concluded with a mocking laugh.

I felt my colour rise. I had certainly not been a match for the wiles of this Delilah.

"It was a very smart idea," she went on, still laughing. "Henri engaged himself as a waiter on the dining-car, and then, when everyone had gone in to the first breakfast, he rushed off for a moment and got the money. I had managed to let him know where the old man was, and as he was alone it was all smooth sailing. He had only to tear off his overcoat, throw the mask out of the window, and hurry back to the dining-room, and he was perfectly safe. No one thought of suspecting a waiter. If anyone had noticed his absence—which was very unlikely in the bustle of getting the breakfast ready—he would have said that he had gone into the kitchen to fetch something. You see, it was very simple."

"Very," I said drily; "and you seem to take it a good deal more coolly now than you did then."

"Oh, I have grown older and harder," she said carelessly. "I was new to such things then, and they upset me."

"It was a lucky escape for you both," I said. "What made you go off in such a hurry?"

"You!" she cried. "I saw your face change as you looked at Henri's hands in the Casino that night (he was very proud of his hands, and took a lot of trouble with them), and I knew that you had seen them before—and where? I remembered your saying you saw two hands pressing the handkerchief over the old man's face. Really, considering your profession, you were very confiding."

I bit my lip. I always had a weakness for a pretty woman, and certainly it must have made me very dull on that occasion.

"That was the last bit of luck we had, though," she continued; "we won a lot on 58—that was the old man's age, we had discovered, so it was bound to be a lucky number. Afterwards—well, afterwards we went from bad to worse, until at last I have got down to this," with an expressive little gesture of disgust. "But that won't interest you, though for old acquaintance sake"—with another mocking laugh—"perhaps you would like to make me a little present before you go? I have been very complaisant, you will acknowledge, and I am not proud."

I was weak enough to do as she suggested.

SCOTTY'S CHRISTMAS PRESENT.

THE fortunes of the roving gold hunter had brought Scotty Collins and Dinny Flynn together in the new mining camp of Slipshod, whither they had gone on hearing of the rich pay-dirt that had been struck there.

It was only natural that they should become partners.

Scotty had once been a clog dancer in some variety troupe, while Dinny had a talent for whistling and warbling, and these accomplishments, exhibited in Slipshod's biggest saloon, "took" with the boys at once, and the two miners became exceedingly popular.

One evening, when the men had gathered in the saloon after their day's work, and in the midst of the whistling and dancing, a new-comer strolled into the place, carrying a violin case in his hand.

He watched the performance for a minute and then quietly drew his violin forth, and, leaning nonchalantly against the bar, started up a jig that forced the two partners to suddenly break off and keep time to it.

A yell of approval went up from the rough crowd when he finished, and the stranger was requested to "take something."

"Scotty," whispered Dinny, "ain't there room enough in our shanty fer that chap?"

"Plenty fer a feller that kin fiddle like that, if he wants to join us, you bet," was the reply, and, on being questioned, the stranger, who said his name was Carter, and that he had come to the camp "to look round an' try his luck," agreed to join them on being invited to do so.

The partnership proved to be a congenial one, and the trio at once became the pride of the camp, and night after night furnished amusement for the miners as well as themselves.

But winter was advancing, and when the snow fell, and the bitter winds swept down the gulch, the miners missed the "Three Pards," as they were called, for, owing to the inclement weather, they were not seen in the camp more than twice a week, their cabin being several miles away.

Since the first heavy snow, four weeks before, the partners had not been able to work their claim, and during the last three weeks that they had worked it, the results of their labours had steadily decreased, giving unpleasant evidence that the claim was giving out.

Perhaps it was thinking of this that made Dinny look so blue that afternoon, as he stared out of the little window of the cabin; either that or the dreary grey of the December sky that threatened another fall of snow before many hours.

It looked cold and forlorn enough, this mountain landscape, everything snow-covered except the blackish slabs of rock on the mountain sides, too precipitous for the snow to cling to. The countless pines, shooting out at all angles, drooped their branches lower under the mantle of white, now and then casting a little off in powdery flakes as a gust of the wintry wind made them tremble.

But the pines that fringed the summit of the hills on the other side of the gulch did not seem to stir. Perhaps it was because they were up so high—it seemed as though their tops must be scraping the clouds that were hurrying past.

It must have been bitterly cold up there, too (so thought Dinny as he meditatively eyed them). Perhaps they were too benumbed by the biting blasts to shiver.

"Scotty will get cotched in another snow if he don't get here perty soon," he remarked. "He wanted me to go 'long with him ter camp. Said he'd get me a Christmas present if I'd go—Christmas is termorry, you know. Hang Christmas. I wouldn't tramp ter Slipshod an' back in this snow fer all ther Christmas presents in creation."

No one with any liking for comfort would have wondered that Dinny preferred to remain at the cabin.

The one room was not very luxuriously furnished, but it was tight and snug.

A few skins were hung on the walls; there was one on each of the three bunks, and several were lying on the floor.

Carter, the tallest and thinnest of the partners, ("Fiddlin' Pete" the miners had already nicknamed him), was sitting cross-legged on one of the skins, puffing his pipe, while he stared hard at the fire that was blazing cheerfully in the fireplace.

Now and then he would glance up as an extra boisterous gust made the cabin shake, or whipped the cloak of snow from some unhappy pine, and threw it spitefully against the windows.

Then he would again turn to the ruddy blaze, inwardly thankful that he was warmly housed, and smoke on with renewed content.

He was in just the proper mood to appreciate Dinny's remark.

"Yer air dead right," he said slowly. "It would take a mighty big Christmas present ter get me ter camp to-day. It's mean weather, mighty mean weather, but it's allus ther way Christmas time up in these yere canyons."

"It'll be er mighty poor Christmas fer us fellers," said Dinny glumly. "I wouldn't a-give a penny, though, fer all ther weather if pay-dirt hadn't give out."

"I reckon we've squeeze her dry, that's a fact, an' there ain't nothin' ter do but prospect fer another when ther season lets us," replied Pete philosophically. "I 'spect we kin pull through ther winter."

Dinny did not answer, but stared up at the leaden sky, which must have been partially to blame for the gloomy state of his feelings.

Pete went on smoking and the room became quiet, except for the snapping of the fire as it tore frantically at the wood and endeavoured to escape up the broad chimney.

While Pete was eyeing the fire and Dinny aimlessly gazing at the snow-covered mountains—great pin-cushions, studded as they were with thousands of barren pines—they heard the report of firearms.

Inclosed though they were in the cabin, the clear mountain air brought the sound to them plainly.

"Must be Scotty," said Dinny. "It comes from up ther gulch. He must a sighted somethin' worth shootin' at."

As he spoke three or four more shots were heard. They were fired in rapid succession.

Dinny looked at Carter, but he seemed oblivious to everything but his pipe.

A minute passed and then half-a-dozen more shots were heard, crowding one after the other.

Carter jerked his pipe from his mouth, and his quick upward glance met Dinny's.

"Well—now—say," he began slowly (he always talked slowly), "what's all that shootin' fer? Mebbe we'd better look inter it a leetle, eh?"

There were two rifles resting on pegs on the wall. One belonged to Scotty, who seldom carried it. The other belonged to Flynn. The latter handed the gun to Pete, who took it rather awkwardly, not being used to such long weapons.

"Think we'll have a chance ter use these things?" he queried.

"Don't know. Scotty may be needin' them guns right about now, for all we know."

Each of them donned a bearskin overcoat of their own manufacture, heavy gloves and caps, and left the cabin.

The cabin was some little distance from the trail that led to Slipshod.

The snow concealed it now; but it was no trouble to know where it was, for it ran along close to the edge of a miniature precipice that rose from the side of the gulch, its edge, whipped by the winds clean of snow, and winding along, mile after mile, a black streak in a field of white, its ragged line pointing out the path.

To avoid the snow that lay deeply elsewhere, the two men kept close to the edge of this shelf of rock that followed the side of the mountain for several miles. There were places, however, where the snow lay in drifts to the very verge of the precipice. Then, again, the side of the mountain would be almost perpendicular. Where the trail led along these protecting walls it was free from snow, except for the occasional contribution of some pine that peered over the ledge above.

When sheltered by these natural snowsheds the men proceeded rapidly, for it gave them a clean path as well as shielding them from the cutting wind, and they grumbled under their frosty beards when they were forced to leave it and face the biting breeze that swept the bare mountain sides.

It was while doggedly trudging along one of these exposed spots that Carter, his head bent, suddenly ran into Denny, who had stopped.

"What's the matter?" he growled. "By hookey! B'ar tracks!"

He discovered at once what had attracted Dinny's attention. There were good-sized bear tracks leading away up the trail. A wide, deep swath in the snow showed where Bruin had come clumsily down the mountain side in a way that must have been half slide and half walk.

"Big feller, that, Pete!" shouted Dinny, for the wind was shrieking loudly through the pines. "This splains that shootin'! Scotty must a-met the cus, an' mebbe he got the wust of it. We'd better be pushin' on."

Pete fell in behind Dinny, but he now kept his head up and his eyes on the alert. The gulch was sinking further and further below them, for the ledge they were treading was now winding upward at a sharp slant. It was narrower, and was bounded by a wall of rock and dirt encroaching so close to the edge as to allow but a precarious footing.

Dinny again came to an abrupt stop.

"Lookee yere, Pete!"

He pointed to the snow that was scattered in patches along the ledge. In the snow were bear tracks coming from one direction, and the prints of boots were to be as plainly seen coming from the other way.

Here man and beast had met. And with what result? Where were they now?

"These yere tracks tell the story, Pete," said Dinny.

"But what in thunder's become of 'em?" said the other. "Neither of 'em backed water, an' they couldn't a-clumb up there," tapping the face of the cliff.

"Dunno. If Scotty, an' it must bin Scotty, had jumped over inter the gulch ter get outer the b'ar's way, the b'ar wouldn't a-follered him. They've got too much sense. A tumble off'n here would squelch a b'ar ter jelly."

"Yes, an' a man, too," said Pete, peering over into the gulch below; "or else bury him so deep in snow he'd never get out. I don't believe Scotty jumped over."

"Well, I'd do it before I'd let a b'ar get a-holt o' me, an' no gun handy. But it'd be a fool trick fer a b'ar, I swear, but it looks though he'd done that very thing."

Carter was leaning over the brink of the ledge.

He called Dinny's attention to a crevice just below the edge of the projecting rock, from which a mass of stones and earth appeared to have been recently loosened. There were also parts of the roots of a tree.

Dinny looked at it carefully.

Then he pointed straight downwards.

The side of the mountain projected outward, so they could not see much of it below them. Thirty-five or forty feet below them was another shelving slope, covered with snow.

Half imbedded in this snow, and its top suspended over the edge, a sheer fifty feet to the bottom of the gulch, was a slender pine.

"There's ther tree that grew in the crack," said Dinny. "I kin see through it now. Scotty has gone over, an' ther b'ar too, an' ther chances are they're both deader'n Mark Antony."

Pete did not inquire who that person was, but proposed that they get down into the gulch as soon as possible.

To do this it would be necessary to proceed a quarter of a mile further.

They hurried away, and when they reached a spot where they could descend, they left the trail and plunged down the hillside.

The snow was over their knees, and much deeper in the bottom of the gulch, so they kept along on the side, pushing ahead as rapidly as possible.

They were passing by a huge boulder, when they heard a warning growl.

A full-grown bear stood in their path, glaring at them angrily.

The sight of the men seemed to enrage him, for, uttering another surly growl, he advanced in a way that was unmistakably hostile.

"Careful now, Pete. His mad is up, for he's got some lead in him already. 'Twon't do for us to make a botch of it."

But Pete knew his business; he had met these mountain lords before.

As cool as the surrounding snow, the two miners took aim at the animal and fired.

The ungainly monster stumbled in his tracks, fell, made a clumsy effort to regain his feet, then sank back in the snow and was still.

"We've done for him," remarked Pete elatedly, as they stood looking down at their trophy.

"An' mebbe he's done fer Scotty, who knows?" replied Dinny dubiously. "See here," and he pointed to spots on the animal's shaggy coat that were blood-stained, "he's bin peppered, an' if anything'll make a b'ar want to tear things up, it's ter have his hide punctured. If Scotty fell inter his paws after poppin' them holes in him, it's all up with him, poor bye."

Anxious to find their comrade, whom they were now convinced had met the bear and tried to vanquish him with his revolver—an almost useless weapon in such a case—they pressed on up the gulch, following the tracks of the bear.

They travelled on for perhaps ten minutes, during which time the tracks had maintained a tolerably straight course.

The tracks ended at a spot where the snow was hollowed out and scattered in every direction.

Down the steep side of the gulch was a deep, wide path in the snow, as though a heavy body had been dragged along. In some places the earth was laid bare.

Dinny climbed up to its starting point, and then looked straight above him.

Overhead was the shelving rock.

"Jes' as I thought," he declared. "Ther b'ar struck ther ledge up there, an' rolled off an' struck here."

"I reckon Scotty didn't foller," said Pete, "else we'd see ther hole he made in ther snow. He must a-lit on ther ledge above. Ther b'ar may have done for him just ther same, an' he may be lying dead in ther snow up thar now. How are we goin' ter git up?"

Dinny did not answer, for he was already tramping away, and Pete could do nothing but follow.

His partner led him along the side of the gulch for quite a distance, and then climbed upward to reach a point where the shelving rock ran into the hillside. Dinny helped the older man to climb upon the ledge.

Pete's long legs were quite useful now, for the snow lay deeply on the ledge, and he had no trouble in keeping behind Dinny, who was struggling through it as fast as he was able.

"Look there! Dinny," suddenly called out Pete.

Dinny turned, and saw that his companion was pointing at the great bare slab of rock, slanting outward from their right, until its keen edge was marked against the sky, showing where the trail led along, thirty or forty feet above them.

A column of smoke was leisurely crawling up the mountain side.

The two men hurried to the spot from whence it seemed to emerge—a crevice running horizontally at the base of the cliff. They could only catch glimpses of it, on account of the huge boulders that were scattered along.

Their curiosity now on edge, they advanced between the boulders and peered into the mighty crevice, a yawning crack in the mountain side, twice the height of a man.

A bright fire was burning there, sending its ruddy light dancing along the dark rock.

And there was Scotty by the fire.

But what ailed him?

He was in the midst of one of the most complicated and fantastic dances they had ever seen him perform. As though exhibiting his skill before thousands of spectators, he gyrated on one foot, swinging the other in the air as he twirled. Then he would suddenly change it to a clog, and his heavy boots thumped a lively tune as he stamped them down on the stony ground.

And all the time he kept tossing something from one hand to the other as a juggler does a ball.

He did not see his two partners staring at him in wonder.

"I know," whispered Pete, thinking he had discovered the clue to Scotty's queer behaviour; "he's dancin' ter keep warm."

Dinny looked solemn as he answered:

"I opine he ain't. He got sech a rap on ther head when he tumbled that it's knocked him clean daft."

This argument made Pete look anxious, as it seemed more reasonable than his own, for in that sheltered spot it could not have been severely cold beside the fire.

Just then Scotty turned and saw them.

"H'ray! h'ray!" he yelled wildly. "We're all right!" and at it he went again, kicking his legs right and left, and tossing that something from hand to hand.

Dinny went up and seized him by the shoulders, and thus brought the performance to a sudden stop.

"Lookee yere, ye durned fool, what ails ye?"

"Nothin'."

"How'd ye get here?"

"Hanged if I know."

"Was that you doin' that shootin' awhile ago. Was them your bullets in that b'ar?"

"Yes. Did you lay him out?"

"Why didn't you kill him while you were about it?"

Dinny spoke with assumed contempt.

"Wal, now, mebbe you think you could do any better with a thirty-two on that kind o' game. It ain't so easy. You see, I war comin' along kinder careless like, an' whistlin' as usual when I'm alone by myself, when all ter onct there war mister b'ar right in my way, as though he'd dropped right thar. You seed the place, I reckon. There wa'n't no climbin' that rock, and as fer turnin' roun' an' runnin', I knowed he'd cotch up with me in less'n no time. But there wa'n't no time ter throw away thinkin' what oughter be done—I jes' had ter do it.

"'Course I had my revolver with me, but I didn't want ter risk it on him.

"There war a pine-tree leanin' out over ther gulch, an' when ther b'ar made fer me, I jus' grabbed a-holt of it, an' clumb up it like a good feller, I tell ye—an' I got up as near ther top as I could get.

"I didn't have no idee ther fool b'ar would try ter follow me up, fer most b'ars would a-known that tree couldn't a-held up his weight. But I 'spects he must a-bin powerful hungry, fer, after a leetle scratchin', he commences ter climb up ter me.

"He kep' on a-comin' a leetle higher an' a leetle closer, an' ther tree never bent nur give 'er grunt, as far as I could see.

"'Thunder!' thinks I, 'if this keeps on he'll have a-holt o' me in less than two minutes,' an' twistin' my legs aroun' ther tree ter keep from fallin' off, I drew my gun an' commenced ter whang away at him. But, Lor' bless you, I couldn't shoot. A weather vane on a church spire wouldn't a-come in fer more wind nur cold than I cotched, perched out on that pine over ther gulch. It jus' began ter freeze me in double quick. There wa'n't no feelin' in my arms nur legs, an' it war all I could do to pull ther trigger, an' as fer tryin' to hit any particular part o' him, I'll jus' tell ye I wa'n't in it, fer I couldn't command my arm no more'n if it had a-bin wood, an' it's a wonder I hit him at all, big as he war.

"I knew I war cracking him, though, by ther way he growled an' scrambled up all ther faster, an' I began ter calc'late how fer I'd have ter drap, an' if ther snow down yonder war deep enough ter keep my bones from breakin'. I judge it war 'bout half er mile from where I war, but I war determined ter drap before I'd let him get near 'nough ter swipe me with that paw of his'n.

"While I was kinder ruminatin' on this, ther tree began ter move. My end war goin' down.

"Ther b'ar quit his climin', dug his claws inter ther tree an' sorter whined. I held on fer dear life. Then ther tree made a half circle sweep downwards that made me dizzy, but it wa'n't a comparison ter when she broke loose. She shot down like a streak. It took my breath away.

"I don't know how it war, but I wa'n't hurt any. If it hadn't been for them branches that I war mixed up in I 'spect some o' my bones would 'a got cracked, fer all ther snow war tol'ble deep.

"As soon as I could think of anythin' I thought o' that b'ar, but he wa'n't nowhere in sight.

"Lookin' over ther edge of ther shelf I seed mister b'ar wallerin' round in ther snow down in their gulch. He'd tumbled off ther ledge an' I didn't come far from it, lemme tell you.

"The next thing war ter get outer there, but I war most anxious ter get to a place where I could get a fire started an' kinder thaw out, fer I war about friz.

"So I looks aroun' an' spies this crack here, an' lops off some o' ther branches o' that pine an' starts a fire."

"An' so you war dancin' ter keep warm, after all?" put in Pete.

"Dancin' ter get warm?" echoed Scotty. "Not by er long shot. You'll dance, too, when I tell you. As I war stoopin' down ter light ther fire, what d'ye 'spose I found?"

"Dunno," said both of them.

"This," and Scotty held out to them that something he had been tossing from hand to hand, and which he had kept behind his back while relating his adventure.

Dinny and Pete did not dance as Scotty predicted they would, but they did swing their hats and utter exultant yells as they examined the article he had handed them.

It was a large gold nugget, liberally endowed with the metal they were all so anxious to procure.

"Scotty, you're a trump," declared Dinny. "We'll have a claim here that'll knock anythin' aroun' these diggin's, eh, Pete?"

"You bet," replied Pete decidedly. "It won't be sech a blue Christmas for us after all, will it, Dinny?"

"Christmas is all right," answered Dinny, comtemplatively examining the nugget. "An' we'll feast on b'ar meat termorry in honour o' ther day an' this chunk."

Christmas was a stormy day.

The wintry wind howled and moaned through the pines and piled snow against the little windows until the interior of the cabin was darkened, but it was one of the jolliest and brightest days the partners had ever spent, and had the miners who passed the time in playing cards in Slipshod's big saloon known that one of the "Three Pards" unique entertainments was in full blast nearly all that Christmas afternoon, with no witnesses to applaud, it is not unlikely that they would have braved the storm to a man and made a pilgrimage through the sleet and snow to the lonely little mountain cabin.

When good weather came again it began to be noised abroad that the "Three Pards" had struck one of the best paying claims around there.

"But what in thunder put 'em in their notion of locatin' a claim in such an unheerd-of place?" was the question that many of them asked, but none could answer.

"Yes, an' they've give it ther durndest name: "Ther Christmas Gift!"

By Madge Morris.

Young John Burton would not marry. It was a great pity, for he was an eldest son with good prospects, and a present income of nearly two thousand pounds. He had a handsome face of the fair Saxon type, a well-built figure, and an easy, jovial temper. Perhaps he was not exactly a style fitted to inspire romantic maids with sentimental yearnings; but his disposition was one eminently suited for domestic wear, and his friends were apt to say of him a little regretfully: "What a capital husband he would make!"

And now he was thirty-three, and it was firmly believed that he had never entertained the least intention of matrimony, or had even been at the trouble of seeking to make himself specially agreeable to any maid, wife, or widow, in town or country. Old Burton, who was just as sweet-tempered and easy-going as his son, used to reassure his wife, and comfort himself with the contented, but somewhat vague, anticipation that "Jack would settle down some day when the right young woman turned up." For now and then the old people felt sorry to find their sixty years upon them, and no grandchildren growing up to cheer their dark days, and to brighten their son's home when they should have left it. Sitting together sometimes in the evening, while Jack was smoking a cigar on the terrace, they would discuss the matter in some such fashion as this; the old gentleman sipping his coffee complacently in the intervals of the conversation, and his wife meantime busy with her needle or knitting pins:

"John," Mrs. Burton would say softly—it was generally she who started the conversation on this particular topic—"John, my dear, don't you think it might be well if you were to point out—of course, only as a hint, you know—to our Jack the advisability of thinking about getting himself a wife?"

"It has often occurred to me to do so, Bessie, but he doesn't seem to me to care for anybody. A man should be in love before marrying, or else, according to my views, he will be miserable after."

"It is odd he doesn't fall in love," says Mrs. Burton, with a reflective air, "considering how many nice girls there are in the county. Alice Fairfax, for instance, and Constance, and that charming little Kate Harries! Kate was at the hunt-ball last Tuesday, you know, and she looked lovely. He danced with her three or four times, but his manner was just the same to her as to all the rest."

"Or there is Georgie Sandhurst, his old playmate. Jack and she used to be great friends before he went to Oxford. But she's almost always in London now, staying with her cousins."

"That little flirt! Oh, John, Georgie will never marry at all; she is quite as bad as Jack himself! They say she has refused ever so many offers, and means to die an old maid."

"I know she is a great flirt, and has several ardent admirers, but I doubt her having definitely refused anybody. I fancy Miss Georgie is rather the sort of young woman to engage herself three or four deep, than to say a serious 'No' to any one of her swains."

Mrs. Burton laughs.

"I shouldn't wonder," she says; "but neither you nor I would care to see Jack in the ranks of the noble army. No, Georgie is very fascinating, but she is not steady enough for our boy. She is devoted to dogs and horses, and I have heard her called 'fast.'"

"I don't know exactly what that term implies, my dear. But though Georgie is certainly daring, and perhaps giddy, I am sure she is genuine and has a good heart. You must make allowances for her; the poor child has been an orphan since her infancy, and her uncle has let her run wild. She is more like a boy than a girl; but there's no harm in her."

"Mr. Sandhurt wishes her to marry, I know; for he told me so not long ago. She is of age now, and he will leave all he has to her. But I should prefer Kate Harries or Connie, or any one else. Georgie cares for nobody save herself and her horses, but the other girls are different. And Kate's family is excellent—old on both sides. She comes of a thoroughly good stock. Cannot Jack be induced to think about it?"

She lays her work down on her lap, and looks appealingly at her husband. Old Burton smiles, sighs, shakes his head, and at length answers with confidence:

"He'll settle down, Bessie, you may be sure, before long—when the right woman turns up, my dear; we all have to wait for that. Why doesn't he come in? It's freezing out on the terrace now. He'll be wanting a cup of coffee in a minute; is it hot still?"

One evening, after a parental discussion closely resembling the foregoing, Jack, returning to the drawing-room, announced his intention of leaving home on the morrow, for a few days' visit to an old college friend in a neighbouring county.

"You'll be back by Christmas, Jack, of course?" said Mrs. Burton. "We couldn't sit down to dinner without you."

"Of course I shall be back, mother; come home on Christmas Eve."

"Tom wants to have a carpet dance on Christmas Eve," she continued; "I didn't refuse—it is to be only small and early. You will be here in time for it?"

"Oh, yes. Who is to be asked?"

"The Jeffery girls, and Dally Forrester, and Kate. You like Kate, I think?"

"Anyone else?" said Jack, evading the question.

"The Smyths, Connie and Alice, and perhaps Georgie Sandhurst, if she is in London. Tom will ask his friends, and you can give him any names you like. We don't want more than eighteen or twenty in all. If you start to-morrow morning, it will be best to give him your list at once. He is in the library."

Jack put his empty coffee-cup on the table and went to join his younger brother.

About a week later, in the early afternoon of Christmas Eve, Jack Burton, having concluded his visit, stood on the platform of a railway station, about thirty miles from his home, awaiting the arrival of the down-train. It was a bright, frosty day; cloudless, keen, and crisp; a day to put one in high spirits and in the best of humours. But the train was late, as trains are apt to be on Christmas Eve, and when at length it panted into the little station, there proved to be but scant space left in the first-class carriages.

"There's one that doesn't seem full," cried Jack to the bewildered porter. "I'll get in there."

He opened the door hastily and sprang in. In the further corner sat a single passenger, a lady, closely enveloped in furs, and looking out of the opposite window. For a moment Jack hesitated, wavered, and would have retired had time and fate permitted.

But before his uncertainty could shape itself in word or act, a shrill whistle sounded, a voice cried: "Right!" and with a jerk and a scream the train sped onward.

"How are you, Mr. Burton?" said a brisk, silvery voice from beneath the fur in the corner.

"Why, Miss Sandhurst, fancy my getting into your compartment! No doubt you were put in here by your discreet cousin, to be kept in safety and seclusion, and I have trespassed on the preserves."

"No, you are wrong! I was put in here at Euston, with my maid to take care of me. But I turned her out at the last station we stopped at, and sent her into another carriage."

"Why did you do that?"

"If I don't tell you why, you will never guess; and if I do tell you why, you won't believe me."

Jack laughed.

"You talk conundrums, Miss Georgie, and I am far too lazy to unriddle anything so intricate. But I am very inquisitive, too."

"Well, I'll tell you. Perhaps you may help me. I turned Belinda out because I wanted to be alone; and I wanted to be alone because——"

She paused, hesitated, and slightly reddened.

"If you wanted to be alone, it follows that I must be in the way," said her companion, feeling in his turn somewhat embarrassed.

"Oh, no!" cried she quickly. "I don't mind you—you are not like Belinda, you know. But I am making a momentous journey to-day, Mr. Burton; for between the next station and H—— I must choose a husband."

"I have had that pleasure once or twice."

"Choose—a husband! What do you mean?"

"Why, just this. It is four years since I 'came out,' you know, and in that time people seem to think I have flirted a great deal. Perhaps I have; but you see, it has been my misfortune to like so many fellows, and yet not to like any of them quite enough. Anyhow, uncle says I must make up my mind, and he has written to tell cousin Mary that I must really say 'Yes' to somebody, or 'No' to all; and she has been worrying me about it horribly for ever so long. And it seems that uncle has had three or four 'bids' for me, and he wrote and told me of them last week, and said that when I came home to-day I must come with a definite reply, for he couldn't stand it any longer, and people were saying I was heartless and all sorts of abominable things.

"Well, I considered and considered, but I couldn't make up my mind. First I thought I liked this one best, and then that, and then another; and then I began considering all over again, and each time it was worse. At last the idea struck me that if I could put them all in a row, and compare them with one another, I might arrive at a clear decision. So long as one only sees people at different times and in different places and circumstances, it's so much more difficult to judge fairly of each. Now, I can't exactly put all my candidates in a row, but I have hit on a lovely plan of seeing them all within an hour after another; and this is what I have done. I wrote to them all, and told each that I was coming down from London to-day, and particularly wished to see and to speak to him a moment on important business, and that my train would stop at such and such a station, at such and such a time, and if he would be on the platform I should be glad to say a few words to him. I appointed a different station for each—the one I thought would be within most convenient distance, according as the candidate was accustomed to ride or walk; and there are just ten minutes between each stoppage. It will be exactly like a review, a kind of 'march past' of the regiment, you know. They are to begin at the next station."

"How many applicants are there?" asked Jack, immensely amused and interested.

"Six. You see it will be all done within the hour; and then I shall collect my impressions, and make up my mind which of them I really prefer. It's no use attempting to do it any other way, because, when I try to do it mentally, I find there's so much to be said for and against each. But if I see and talk to them one after another, and am able to compare with each, I shall be sure to find out the nicest. Isn't it a grand idea?"

"It is worthy of you, Georgie; therefore, it is profoundly ingenious and wildly startling. The train is slackening speed now. Who is to be on view at the first station?"

Georgie slipped her fur hat aside, disclosing a rosy face, with full-curved lips, a "tip-tilted" nose, and a pair of merry brown eyes.

"I have written down the names in order in my pocket-book," said she, producing from a recess in the folds of her mantle the article in question.

"Tambridge Station—Cecil Vivian."

Jack was about to utter a commentary, but Georgie lifted a warning finger and he was silent in time, for the train had already stopped. She leant from the window, nodded gaily, and cried:

"Glad to see you, Mr. Vivian! I thought you would do me the kindness to come, especially as I know you ride over here so often. Think you have met Mr. Burton?"

"I have had that pleasure once or twice," said a melancholy, measured voice; and a tall man in riding gear, dark-skinned and heavily moustached, stood by the carriage, clasped Georgie's proffered hand, and bowed gravely to Jack.

"So you are returning from town, Miss Sandhurst, and I hope for some time? Do you get out here?"

"Oh, no! I go on home to H—— I wanted to see you for a moment only as I passed, and I supposed this was your nearest station. What a lovely day! Perfect for riding, isn't it?"

"Perfect. You are good enough to wish to honour me with some commission, I think?"

"Certainly," cried Georgie hurriedly. "It is about a horse; the horse Miss Dawtry wants to sell, you know—bay, with black points. I have ridden him once or twice. Could you be so kind——"

The guard blew his whistle and waved his hand warningly. "Step back, please; the train's off!"

"One moment, my good fellow," said Vivian, with an air of authority: "I wish to speak to this lady."

"Beg pardon, sir; behind time. Can't wait!"

"Oh, never mind, then!" cried Georgie energetically. "It doesn't matter in the least. Another time will do. So kind of you, Mr. Vivian! Horrid of them to be in such a hurry; see you at my uncle's instead. Good-bye."

An expression of infinite disgust, not unmixed with anger, gathered upon Vivian's dark face as Georgie drew back into her corner, and the train moved on. Surely he had provocation. To ride some twelve miles on a freezing day to keep an appointment on "business" with one's adored, and to be dismissed in this airy fashion, as though the whole meeting were the merest accident. But perhaps the experience would serve to lessen the pangs of a greater disappointment assuredly in store for him.

Jack laughed outright.

"Poor Vivian!" said he. "I fancy we have not left him so good-humoured as we found him. I really begin to think you are what the Yankees call a 'cool hand'!"

"What do you think of him?"

"I should say," answered Jack, with deliberation, watching her face closely as he spoke—"I should say that he will not suit. He is too melancholy for you, too ceremonious: and he has a temper, Georgie! I saw it flash out when we started. He has a 'vicious eye,' like your old chestnut, Xantippe."

Georgie opened her pocket-book demurely, and drew out her pencil:

"But, Mr. Jack," said she, "he is so very rich. Old Sir Cecil, his grandfather, has left him all his property."

"I wouldn't put wealth in the scale against happiness, if I were you, Georgie," said her companion, more earnestly.

She drew a line dividing a page of her pocket-book in the centre, and wrote at the top of one column, "Advantages;" at the top of the other, "Disadvantages." Under the first column she inscribed the words: "C.V.: Rich;" under the second: "Melancholy; vicious." Then she handed the memorandum to Jack.

"That's business-like, at all events," said he, more and more amused. "What a funny girl it is! Are you going to make similar entries on all the 'applicants'?"

"Certainly," replied she, shutting the book. "'Aids to meditation,' you know. Here's station No. 2."

"And who is here?" asked Jack, bending eagerly towards the window. "I don't see anybody, except old General Benbow."

"Well," she returned, in a low, swift whisper, "he's the man. Don't exclaim; they're all ages and sizes."

The train stopped; the General advanced with the courtly bow of an old-fashioned gentleman.

"Good-morning, Miss Georgina. How are you, Burton? I am glad to see Miss Sandhurst has so efficient an escort. We have missed her sadly of late in this part of the world."

Then, after a few kindly commonplaces: "And the 'business,' Miss Georgie?—though the pleasant anticipation of seeing you was quite business enough to bring me here."

"Good morning, Miss Georgina!"

"You are too good, General; but, the fact is, your gamekeeper has a mastiff, a beautiful dog, which my uncle admires greatly. Now, I want to give uncle a Christmas present, and, of course, I couldn't ask Gough about it before him, you know, and so I thought it would be a good idea to get you to meet me here and let me know if Gough would bring his dog over to-morrow morning after church. He wants £5 for him, I think. Now——"

"Say no more about it, Miss Georgie. Of course the mastiff is yours to do what you please with. Gough shall take him over to you by noon; but, mind, you don't owe him anything. No, no; don't be cruel, Miss Georgie. Give me this pleasure, or we shall quarrel, and that won't do at Christmas-time—peace and goodwill, you know. You haven't an idea what a delight it is to me to be of service to you, even in so small a thing. There's your train starting! Good-bye, both of you, till we meet again!"

And the General was left on the platform, smiling, and waving his hand towards the receding train.

"Well, Mr. Burton, isn't he charming?"

Georgie leaned back as she put the interrogatory, and fixed her bright eyes full on her companion's face.

"Yes; extremely charming. I have always thought the old General the best and most thoroughly kind-hearted fellow in the county, barring my superior officer, of course."

Georgie seized her pencil.

"But," continued Jack, "although he would make you an excellent papa-in-law, the pity is he has no son to make you a husband."

"What do you mean?"

"That girls of twenty should not mate with old boys of sixty. No, Miss Georgie, he is not to be thought of in the particular capacity under consideration. Think of the infirmities to which, in about ten years' time, he will, in the natural course of things, be subject! You will then be in the prime of your womanhood and will need, not a patient to mind, but a protector to mind you. He is too old by half: and it is his only fault, but it is decisive against him."

She was silent an instant, and a regretful expression lifted the corners of her eyebrows, and depressed her lips. Then she made a short entry: "General B: Perfect temper. Too old for the work."

"The next candidate," she said, consulting her list, "is Mr. Piggott-Crawford."

"What! The Rector of Burnitt! You can never think in sober earnest of becoming a parson's wife?"

"No, frankly. I don't think it would suit; but still I thought I would trot him out, as he seems to have gone in seriously for me. I suppose he thinks I should suit him, or he wouldn't have done it."

"I am curious to know what 'business' you can have invented as the occasion of a rendezvous with him. Not a horse or a dog, I should fancy?"

"Of course not, you goose; but hothouse flowers for his church decorations to-morrow. I told him in my note that if he would be at the station as I passed, and let me know whether they would be acceptable, I would send Robert over on a pony to the Rectory this evening, with a basketful of camelias and white roses for the altar. Hush, we are stopping, and there he is!"

The interview with the Rector of Burnitt was but a brief one; for no passenger alighted, and the train remained stationary only long enough to allow Georgie's reverend suitor time for an acknowledgment of her offer, and eager acceptance of it.

"So thoughtful of you, my dear Miss Sandhurst. I only wish you could come over to the early celebration to-morrow, and see how beautiful the altar will look; but, of course, you will be assisting at your parish church. To-night we have a midnight service, you know. I love the sweet old Catholic custom; don't you? Good-bye, and God bless you!"

Then, without consulting Jack, Georgie wrote on the recording page:

"P.C.—No advantages. Much too slow a goer."

"That disposes of No. 3," said she.

"And who is No. 4?"

"You will never guess."

"I should never have guessed the last two candidates. But you seem to compel all hearts alike, old and young, grave and gay. We have had the Army and the Church; perhaps the next applicant will represent the profession of medicine, or of law?"

"So thoughtful of you, my dear Miss Sandhurst."

"No; he is 'a scion of a noble house,' as the sixpenny novelists say. Unless he plays me false, you are about to behold the lofty and aristocratic lineaments of a British peer of the realm."

"Oh, now I know your man! It is Lord Pinkerville! Well, that is no surprise at all. Everybody in the county settled the match between you ten or twelve months ago."

Georgie tossed her head and pouted.

"Everybody had better mind their own business," said she ungrammatically, but with severe emphasis. "I only put him down in the list because he happened to be one of the lot, and must be taken in order. But he is quite too dreadfully odious!"

"And why?"

"He hasn't an idea in his head. At least, I am forced to that conclusion; for he is one of those men who think it necessary when talking to a woman to avoid mentioning anything of interest, public or private. Therefore, as I have no means of knowing whether he ever thinks at all on any other subjects than lawn tennis and the last new waltz, he is no more to me than a mere talking doll in masculine attire."

"You are strong-minded, then, Miss Georgie?"

"I fear not; for, you know, that word is anything but a reproach. Surely it ought rather to be a reproach to be thought weak-minded. I like a woman who dares to think her own thoughts, and to do her own deeds, and to be a person, instead of a thing! I wish to be a person, and I should like my husband to be one too."

Jack became more interested than ever in this quaint little girl and her naïve, ingenuous speeches.

"Yet," said he, "they say you prefer horses to persons, and all animals generally, to the male biped of your own kind?"

"Yes," she answered, a touch of pathos in her clear tones; "I think it is a true bill. Someone once said in reply to a similar charge: 'The more I know of men, the more I admire dogs.' Well, that is a little my feeling. Horses and dogs are genuine, they never forget a friend; and if you love them, and show it, they will love you back without reserve, with entire trust, and for yourself alone.

"You may tell all your heart to your horse or your dog whenever you are in trouble, or grieved or indignant about anything, and he will understand and sympathise with you, and tenderly comfort you, and never betray you. Ah, I have told my horse Nestor lots of things nobody else knows, time after time!"

She checked herself abruptly, sighed a little, then laughed, and lowered the window.

"Look, there's the noble Viscount; and see—what a beautiful bouquet he has! That's for me, of course. I wonder what the guard thinks of my holding a levée like this at every station?"

"Charming weather, Miss Sandhurst, but confoundedly cold! Let me wish you all the compliments of the festive season. Train seems very full to-night. Thought you were at X——, Mr. Burton. Chaperoning Miss Sandhurst, I see. Congratulate you on your good fortune. Will you allow me to leave you a few flowers, Miss Sandhurst? I know you like flowers—remember you are a great admirer of roses—heard you say so once or twice. Going to be a hard frost to-night, I fancy. Not many balls on in town now, I suppose?"

"Not many. But we shall have a good deal of dancing down here for the next month or two, you know. I dare say I may get a waltz or so to-night."

"Really? After your journey? You are indefatigable! By-the-way—see the guard going to hold up his hand?—mustn't forget to ask what it is I can have the pleasure of doing for you; think you wanted to see me for something or other?"

"I'm afraid it was only the gratification of having a chat with you, Lord Pinkerville, and of receiving these lovely flowers;" and burying her pert little nose in the bouquet, Georgie smiled mischievously at her interrogator.

"Upon my word, Miss Sandhurst, you are too overwhelming, too complimentary, you know, I mean. It is unspeakably delightful to find oneself so flatteringly appreciated—above all, by your too charming self! Well, good-bye, au revoir."

"How can you say such things, Miss Georgie!" cried Jack, as they glided onward; "and to a man whom you pretend you don't like?"

"That's just exactly why," she retorted recklessly. "If I cared for him the least bit, of course, I should behave as if I didn't."

"But why, in heaven's name?"

"Because all girls do," said Georgie, with conviction. "It's a way we have." Upon which Jack mused awhile in silence. Presently he said:

"There's only one more station, I think?"

"And two more deputations," answered she. "I was obliged to give them both the same place of rendezvous. They are Fred Forrester, and his cousin, Harry Fielding."

"And they have both 'applied,' as you call it, to Mr. Sandhurst?"

"Not at all. They both 'applied' to me personally, but at different times. And I told both of them the same thing—that I couldn't make up my mind just then. And they both said they'd wait till I did."

"I know you like flowers."

"How nice of them! And do they know why you have asked them to meet you this evening?"

"I said I had a parcel to leave on my way for Dolly Forrester; and if they would walk down to the station to meet this train I would give it to them. Here's the parcel; it's a little moonstone locket for Dolly." And she opened a small travelling bag, and produced from thence a little packet tied up with a blue ribbon, and inscribed: "With best Christmas wishes to dear Dolly."

"For invention of detail, if not for boldness of design, Miss Georgie, you beat every diplomatic artist it has ever been my fortune to hear of."

"That is a far more handsome compliment than you have paid me yet. But now, pray observe, and lend me your 'most considered counsels,' for these are the two likeliest applicants for the vacancy. Why, there's Fred alone! Where's Harry? I don't see Harry."

"May there not have been 'pistols for two, and coffee for one' ordered on receipt of your double-barrelled invitation? People who play such dangerous games as yours must expect tragic dénouements now and then, you know."

"What a nuisance!" she exclaimed peevishly. "Now that puts me all out of my reckoning. And it's just Harry I like best of all!"

"Ye s'ould ha'e told him that before!" said Jack aggravatingly. "'T'was ever thus from childhood's hour!'"

"Do be quiet!" cried Georgie, quite fiercely, and putting her head out of the window as the train entered the station. "Why, Fred!" she exclaimed, with but scant ceremony. "Where's Harry?"

"A Merry Christmas, Georgie! It's getting quite dark. I should never have found you if you hadn't hailed me."

"A Merry Christmas to you, too, Fred. Here is Mr. Burton going home with me. And here's my Christmas present for Dolly. I know she wanted a moonstone locket, so I got her one. My love and best wishes with it. But I thought Harry would have been here, too."

"Ah, Georgie, I see you don't get the latest telegrams from this populous locality. That locket of yours will contain somebody's photograph before it hath been twenty-four hours in my fair sister's possession, else I am content 'to be writ down an ass.'"

"What! Dolly—your cousin Harry!"

"Precisely. The state of the case could not have been more correctly or more succinctly put. My sister Dolly has pledged herself to become the property of Cousin Harry on the shortest notice, consistent with the convenience of certain dressmaking and confectionery establishments; and he charged me to say all that was amiable to you on his behalf, and to tell you that Dolly particularly wished him to stay with her this evening to help in the decorations of the room, and he had to obey orders."

For a moment Georgie's self-possession seemed hardly equal to the emergency. Jack's eye was on her, and she knew it, and flushed from throat to brow. Then, with a visible effort, and lips whose trembling betrayed her emotion, or perhaps her annoyance only:

"Why, this," cried she, "is indeed a surprise! Unless you are joking, Fred?"

"Not a particle of joke in the matter, Georgie; it's a real genuine sale of bonâ-fide articles. But, as you sapiently observe, it is a surprise, and one of very recent date. The engagement was only announced to me yesterday, and the world—that is to say, the county—will probably not be informed of it until after Christmas week. So don't go and let it out prematurely; for Dolly and her young man are deuced shy, and they want to get all the snap-dragon and plum pudding over before starting the case in public. Well, you're off, I see; shall I meet you to-night?—carpet-dance at your place, Burton—and Tom's asked me. Dolly and Harry will come, too; but mind, Georgie, and you, too, old fellow, mum's the word. Ta-ta till nine o'clock."

"What a nuisance!" she exclaimed peevishly.

And again the train sped on, and the last of Georgie's "candidates" was lost in the fast gathering gloom of the winter twilight. She leant back in her seat, silent, and doubtless piqued. Was it only pique, Jack wondered, or had she really cared for the recalcitrant Harry? She was candid; it would not, he thought, be difficult to get at the truth. Better to break the pause bravely.

"It's very remiss of me, Miss Georgie, but I have actually quite forgotten to ask the question Fred put to you just now, and which, by-the-way, you did not answer: Are you coming to our dance to-night?"

"Certainly. Didn't I tell Lord Pinkerville that this very evening I should make use of his nosegay?"

"Come," thought Jack, "if she can dance, she's not so very hard hit."

"And," continued Georgie, with considerable warmth, "I wouldn't miss going now on any account, just to let Mr. Harry know that I have heard of his engagement, and that I don't care a pin!"

"Of course, that's the proper and amiable spirit to show," returned Jack approvingly. "But you see the trampled worm will turn occasionally."

"You are odious, with your quotations and proverbs and morals!" cried she with vehemence. "It's not more than a month since Harry spoke to me last, and begged for an answer. And I said—well, I don't quite remember what, but it was much the same as I had said before, and he ought, at least, to have waited till I set him free."

"But he was never bound!" expostulated Jack with some reason.

"Well, I don't care. I dare say I should have refused him, after all; and I hope Dolly and he will be happy. But he was certainly the nicest in the catalogue. Fred's no good, and I hate all the rest; and I get out at the next station. How dark it is, and so awfully cold, too!"

Jack handed Georgie forth.

Jack leant forward and closed the window, which had remained lowered since they left the last station. As he re-seated himself, a gleam of light from a roadside lamp flashed upon Georgie's face, and he saw her brown eyes were fixed steadfastly on him.

"Georgie, do you remember building sand houses, down by the brook at Longdorne, with me when we were children? You were a flirt even then, and I used to suffer terrible pangs of jealousy in consequence of the way in which you would carry on with young Hawthorne."

"Yes, Jack; and you and he had a fight about it in the long meadow, and I looked on; and we all had cake and damson wine together, afterwards, under the big elm. Oh, I remember it perfectly, and lots of things besides. Are you ever jealous of me now, Jack?"

"Little brazen jade!" thought Jack. "What girl in the world, save Georgie, would dare ask a man such a question as that, under the circumstances?"

But he answered aloud:

"I have no right to be jealous now; and besides, are you not about to dismiss all your admirers?"

"Yes. I shall live and die an old maid. Old maids are often much happier than wives. I shall build a model hospital for poor women, and appoint women physicians to attend them, and institute an Order of Mercy for the better protection of animals, and do lots of things I am always thinking about and longing to do, and to see done. And it will be better far to make the world happier and more human, than to marry some stupid man, and do and be what every ordinary housekeeping, stocking-darning, married woman does, and is all the world over."

"If you married the right man, Georgie, he would take an interest in such things as those you name, and would help you."

"But I don't know any man who would interest himself in these things. Certainly, none of those we have seen to-day; except, perhaps, the old General—for my sake, you know. But we thought him too old. And there are no more candidates."

"The sixth candidate has come, Georgie, and is travelling with you. It is your old chum, Jack Burton. Are you going to break my heart now as you did in the old days? Are you determined to wear the white flower all your life?"

* * * * *

Lights multitudinous gleamed from the windows and poured through the open door of Longdorne Grange. Carriages followed one another in quick succession up the avenue leading to the house, and group after group of youthful figures flitted through the entrance, and clustered about it with laughter and jest, and merry greeting.

A carriage rolled to the door and stopped. Then, pausing only to bestow a nod of familiar recognition on the garrulous spectators, Jack handed Georgie forth, resplendent in white silk and Christmas roses.

"So glad to see you, Georgie!" "What a lovely bouquet!" "How did you come to meet Jack?" "Picked him up on the way?" "Come into the tea-room." "Lovely moonlight night, isn't it?" cried all the voices in Dutch chorus.

"Jack," said Mrs. Burton, appearing at the tea-room door, "how late you are. We feared you must have missed the train. You'll have no time to dress before snapdragon. Why, you are dressed!" she cried, as her son uncoated himself and appeared in evening garb.

"It was my fault, dear Mrs. Burton," exclaimed Georgie, pressing through the group at the doorway, and embracing the old lady. "He stopped to take care of me. I came down by the same train, in the same carriage; and so we went home together and saw uncle, and Jack changed his things while I dressed, and we came here in the brougham together."

Something in Georgie's eyes—a light unaccustomed, deeper and softer perhaps than hitherto—arrests the mother's attention.

"Together!" she repeats doubtfully. "You came together? Jack," turning to her son, "Jack, my dear boy——"

But she stops abruptly, and asks no more, for she sees written on her son's face the announcement for which she has so long waited in vain.

"Mother," he says, taking the girl's hand in his, "I see you have guessed the news already—Georgie has promised to be my wife."

And Mrs. Burton, pleased and proud because Jack is happy, takes the little flirt to her heart, and kisses her cordially, without a regretful thought for sober Kate Harries.

PRIZE IDEA STORY.

FARMER HAYSEED'S DILEMMA.

LOOK ON PAGE 858.

OLD GEORGE hadn't much book learning, that's a fact; but what a heap he did know about potatoes—much more than any three other men in the county, I dare swear. 'Taters was George's pet hobby. It was 'taters, 'taters, 'taters, always 'taters, indoors and out. Even now he was sitting out in his patch of garden peeling potatoes for the stew, and he was happy.

Well, there was just two more to do, and old George was feeling round for them at the bottom of the pail, when he stopped suddenly.

"It 'ud be a good idea," said old George, and he took the bits of adhering peel from the knife with a finger and thumb, dried it by rubbing both sides across his corduroy trousers, pushed his stool away just a bit, and proceeded to go indoors.

But he hadn't got as far as the door when he stopped, turned pale, and scratched his head.

"Well, I never!" said old George; "hanged if I haven't come away without my idea!"

So back he went, turning out his pockets on the way, and felt in the pail for his idea. But it wasn't there. It wasn't under the pail, either, and it wasn't in the grass anywhere about, because he spent quite half-an-hour looking for it.

Then old George said: "Some'un's stolen it."

And someone must have stolen it (for old George was quite sure he had an idea half-an-hour ago, and hadn't got it now), unless a crow had flown away with it. But that never struck old George—at least, it didn't that day.

Well, he couldn't spend for ever and for ever looking just about for it, could he, so off he toddled home, and he said to his wife Sarah: "Sarah, I've lost my idea."

"No," said Sarah amazed, "have you though? Where did you lose it, George?"

"I dunno," said old George, "or I'd go and find it," and he laughed, and Sarah laughed too presently when she saw through it, for it was a smart thing to say—at least it was a smart thing for old George to say. "It must be found too," said old George, "for it was quite a good idea." So old George turned out the cupboards, and he turned in the window shutters, and he turned up the carpet, but no, his idea was not to be found.

Old George thought he'd got it one time though. "Dunno," said old George, "but what it might ha' slipped through that hole in my pocket into my stockings." But when he came to look into his stockings there was a hole in each of them, and it wasn't in either of his boots. Nothing could work out of those boots.

Well, old George went on looking for his idea for quite a long while. It was quite a good idea, you remember, and worth looking for, and he got thin and irritable looking for it and not finding it. So one night, about nine o'clock, while he was lying in bed thinking whatever he could have done with it (for, as you know, they go to bed very early in the country), he dug his elbow into his wife's ribs and woke her up with a start, and made her put her head under the sheet and scream thinking, most likely, it was thieves, and he said: "Sarah, shouldn't wonder if someone hasn't taken that idea of mine up to Lunnon. It was the best idea in the world, you know, and they take all the best things up there for the rich folk to buy."

Well, nothing would do old George but that he must get up and dress there and then and go right off to London by the next train. It was about half-past eight in the morning when he got there, and an hour later he found himself on Waterloo Bridge. Everybody seemed to be going the one way, and old George could not help but notice that quite a number of men were carrying little bags in their hands.

"I'll be bound," said old George, "my idea's in one of those bags!" The more he thought of it the more likely it seemed, and at last he went up to a gentleman who was carrying a big and heavy bag, and he said, did old George: "'Scuse me, mister, but might you have my idea in that there bag?" And the gentleman stopped and said to old George: "Get your hair cut."

And old George said to himself: "Well, it's not half a bad idea, but it's not my idea."

However, he didn't ask any more people what they had in their bags, but he walked into the Strand and found that they'd got the road up. Then old George turned pale, and he said: "I always did hear tell these Londoners were smarties," and he went up to the first workman he came to and said: "I say, mister, might they be looking for my idea?"

And what the man said it isn't nice to repeat. It was rude, very rude, and it made old George blush crimson—and, mind you, outdoor life had made old George pretty crimson as it was. So he turned and left the rude man as quickly as he could, until presently, as he walked along, he saw a policeman standing in the middle of the road with his right arm stuck out, and all the cabs and 'buses standing still behind him.

Old George had a good look at him, and he noticed that his coat-tails bulged out, and then he suddenly remembered that down in the parts where he came from policemen were called "guardians of the peace," but his policemen never had such power as this policeman seemed to have, and guardian, of course, meant keeper. Why, there couldn't be any doubt about it—there was old George's idea bulging out of the policeman's pocket.

Well, old George meant to have his idea. So what did he do but steal round to the rear of the policeman and put his hand into his pocket—the policeman's pocket of course. Old George didn't know quite what happened next. Indeed, old George wasn't quite sure about anything until the next morning, when he found himself in the court-house and the policeman saying something about the "execution of his duty." Old George thought it was all up with old George then, and felt the rope round his neck, but the magistrate only gave him 30 days.

When old George came out he gave up his idea as lost for ever, and took the first train home. It was a terribly hot day; the road was long and dusty, and old George was quite worn out when he got to his house. But, lo! and behold, there was his idea lying upon the doorstep. In a frenzy of delight he stooped and picked it up, dusted it carefully, and carried it indoors.

"Sarah," said old George, "I've found my idea."

"No," said Sarah; "have you though?"

"Yes," said old George, "and it's quite the best idea in the world, as I said it was."

"Well," said Sarah, "what is it?"

"Why," said old George, beaming all over, "it's——"

[What was this great idea? £10 is offered to the person who correctly names it. See page 858.]

Or, THE ROMANCE OF A LOST CONTINENT.

By GEO. C. WALLIS, Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," etc.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The Graven Shaft.

Marenso sat thoughtfully silent awhile, watching the fire-flies that began to gather in the gloom, whilst I covered little Alcis—who had fallen asleep, tired out with youthful frolics—with a corner of my cloak and held him tenderly on my knee. The servant, Arac, was reclining on the ground half-a-dozen paces off, having crept closer to us that he might hear the Sleeper's tale. Presently the latter went on:

"I was thirty and three years old when the war came to an end, and in the seven years that followed, as I told thy Queen, no enemy dared lift his hand against Monteza's crown. Wealth and honour were mine in plenty, and I had all things I desired, save one. That one thing I lacked was a mate to love and by whom to be loved; a fair companion to share my fame, to grace my table, to sweeten my resting hours.

"In the fourth of the seven years of peace I thought I had found my wish, for one of the ladies of the palace, Leolin by name, so enthralled me by her beauty and her grace, that I fell an easy and willing victim to her charms, and asked her to become my wife. It was no light honour, and I could see that she was not disinclined to become my bride, but the King, also, had cast eyes of longing upon her and she was not proof against the great temptation. Monteza was then wifeless, and so great was his ardour that he offered her the Queen's seat. She took it, and they two ruled over me—the master whom I had served so well, and the fair one whom I loved to my own sorrow.

"In time, however, Leolin grew tired of her royal husband, and his attentions palled on her, in which plight she turned to me for companionship and comfort—to me whom she had cast over as a useless toy before. For a time our friendship was but friendship; for I struggled hard against the yoke I saw impending, but in the end our relations could no longer be called friendship. Her hatefulness of the King's company, and my love for her, broke down all the barriers that discretion, pride, and vengeance should have reared between us for ever, and so, we loved in secret. I need say no more to you, King Arnon."

I thought of Listra, and held my peace.

"Now, though the matter never reached the ears of Monteza whilst I remained awake," pursued the Sleeper, "it someway came to the knowledge of my brother, Mattoni the priest, when I was in my fortieth year, giving him great concern. He foresaw, as well as I, the direful result of my folly, if persisted in, and strove to turn me from it, but in vain.

"In desperation he avowed that sooner than see me come to disgrace and death, he would cast me into a sleeping trance, nor wake me from it till either the King or Queen were dead. I laughed and said:

"'Tis not a bad thought of thine, brother. But if thou dost so, lay me in the Grotto sacred to Truth, for there none of my enemies may come at me to do me a hurt whilst I sleep!'

"'Mirthful words full often come true,' said Mattoni gravely, 'and I will bear thy wish in mind if ever I carry out my threat, though I must warn thee that the Priests of Truth aver that whosoever sleepeth in the Grotto beyond the lifetime of a man shall wake not until the time of the last King of Atlantis.'

"'I care not for priestly prophecies,' I said, 'my own right arm hath ever proved my staunchest friend, as well thou knowest, brother; and even were the tale true, thou wouldst waken me before I had slept so long, which no man could. But why talk we as men full of wine and folly? Let us speak of present things. Goest thou to-morrow to the Isle of Olives with me? Olasin hath promised to be ready to start at morn, and nowhere have we such excellent fishing!'

"'I will come to the palace for thee ere the dawn hath opened thine eyes!' answered my priest-brother, with a hidden meaning that I found not for a thousand years, and then we parted to meet no more until our spirits find each other in the Shadows. I went to my apartments that night, to supper with the Queen, and sank into an easy slumber. I know not any more until I heard thy voice commanding me to awake, and I came to new life as thou saw'st me, in my own land still, it is true; but to find it sadly shrunken in its size and all its people strangers to me.

"What became of the King my master, of the Queen my mistress, or of my brothers, I know not; nor is anyone alive who can tell me, but I can frame some sort of story regarding them that I think is likely to be true. There is more in priestly magic than I thought, and I believe that my brother, coming to my room in the early morn, threw me into a senseless sleep, afterwards causing me to be conveyed to the Sacred Grotto. Once there, I believe that the Priests of Truth, in accordance with their tradition, and, it may be with an eye to notoriety and wealth should it be fulfilled, kept all people from me, refusing even the King admittance. Then I must imagine that Mattoni, who alone had power to recall me to life, died suddenly before it could be done. Thus I account for my long, deep sleep, though at best 'tis only a plausible tale."

"So plausible that 'tis likely to be the true one," I said, "and showeth that the Spirits work their will in their own way, heeding not our lives or wishes in the reaching of their aims. Yet it would ill become me to murmur, whom they have blessed with all that heart desires and more than hope once dared to hope for. Their will be done."

"Their will be done," re-echoed my companion; and then, the story ended, we sat there together in silence, busy with our own thoughts, till night had shrouded the shore with a faint darkness and menacing storm-clouds gathered overhead. I was about to remark that 'twas time to be up and away, when suddenly and clearly, my ears caught the well-known sound of oars dipping in the water. I whispered caution to the others, and carrying Alcis, still asleep in my arms, stepped down to the inshore sand and there listened, endeavouring to find the whereabouts of the boat that dared intrude on our fishing place.

The sound ceased, but almost at the moment there came the noise of someone crashing through the undergrowth of the dell, as if pressing towards us from the outer shore of the little promontory. Back again, up the graded slope I strode, till I caught the sheen of the sea behind the trees, and saw a score of moving figures flitting about in the shadowy shelter.

"Hold, there!" I cried, "and give an account of yourselves for trespassing on the King's preserves. Know you not that this is our especial fishing ground?"

For answer came a mocking laugh, and in angrier tones I repeated my command, and Marenso ordered them, in the name of King Arnon and his Chief Minister, to show themselves: one replied derisively that he knew no such authority. Intending to lay Alcis on the soft turf to be out of danger, I called to Arac and Marenso to go forward and discover who these knaves were, but at the same time an order was given to the mysterious band in the Atlantian tongue and in a voice that was strangely familiar to me: there was a twanging of bow-strings and the whistle of arrows and the Sleeper and Arac fell to the earth pierced through with the feathered shafts. I also should have fallen there, dead, shot through the heart, but that the body of little Alcis, still pressed to my breast, received and stayed the fatal arrow that was speeding straight to my vital part. It scratched the skin beneath my tunic as it was, but that was all. Yet at what a cost was I saved!

The little body in my arms quivered a moment and gave a little cry, then stiffened out and was still for ever. Tenderly I laid him down, that youngest son of mine, my gentle Alcis, who in dying had saved my own life, and with dagger in hand, rushed towards the foe, feeling in that instant of mingled grief and rage, like a lioness robbed of her cubs. How I cursed the love of ease that had lately grown on me and made me leave my famous sword in the palace! With that in my grasp I could face and slay a score of enemies, but now I had only a short, sharp-pointed knife wherewith to strive against an unknown force.

In the mad blindness of my advance my feet caught the prostrate body of Arac, and, stumbling, I fell headlong to the ground. In a moment, 'mid a shower of arrows, I was afoot again, only to be thrown to earth again over the fallen form of Marenso. As I went down the second time, cursing loudly, footsteps clustered round, voices sounded, heavy blows rained fast upon me, and one, catching me full on the head, made a thousand stars dance redly before my eyes and caused my brain to reel. Yet I was not utterly unconscious after it, for I heard a medley of tongues consulting over me, and a firm, clear order given in the voice that sounded so familiar, but which I could not recognize; then came the sound of footsteps dying away in the distance, and all was still.

When all had gone I rose to my feet—slowly and with keen pain, for I felt as though I had fallen from a great height upon rough stones so bruised and aching was my carcase—and followed their track to the seashore, stumbling often and groaning with agony at every step. At last, with a great effort, I reached the sea, to find, as I expected, my unknown enemies gone.

There were few stars visible through the murky cloud-rack that moved along o'erhead, and no moon, but a faint phosphorescence shone on the waves and lit up the leaden-hued horizon, showing me, in a hasty, searching glance, a full-rigged sailing vessel, far away in the offing, now vanishing like a phantom craft.

Now, though I could fain have laid me down on the wet sand and writhed in torture, I remembered that I was a king and that 'twas never the way of Didron's son to cry out at pain or give way to it, and back again I struggled through the belt of mangroves, to where my son lay lifeless by the water's brink. The fatal arrow was still in his little body, and with a heart sore with grief and a mind black with rage, I drew it forth and held it a moment in my hand, standing as one dazed.

Just as I would have hurled it, spitefully, into the waters of the creek, a brilliant glare of light lit up the dimness, showing me, in one swift look, the figure of a cross cut on the shaft, and under it, graven in the written characters of our tongue, the name of Listra, Princess of Aidè! Then the thunder bellowed forth its reverberating roar and darkness settled down upon me, while the flood-gates of the sky were opened and the rain fell in soaking torrents.

How shall I describe the storm that raged within my soul that night? which raged so fiercely that I heeded the howling tempest around, and its lightning flashes splitting the veil of its ebon shade, even less than on a careless day I would have heeded the idlest zephyr that ever ruffled the curls of my raven hair. So swiftly and tumultuously tossed the thoughts within my aching head, that at last, worn out alike with mental and with bodily anguish, I fell upon the sodden, steaming ground, and with one arm clasping little Alcis, sank into a fevered sleep.

Meantime, Briseis, growing troubled at my long absence, questioned Valdo regarding my safety many times, and sent, with some of the Royal Guard, when the storm broke in its fury, to see that I was brought to the palace before any harm could befall me. This command my faithful retainer hastened gladly to obey, so that when I woke from my troubled sleep it was to find myself in my own apartment, watched and tended by my own dear Queen, even as she had watched and tended me long years agone, when I lay, a helpless fugitive, in her fair and stately mansion.

Her eyes were red with weeping now, and on the queenly head was set the chaplet of dead dwarf ferns, the sign of a great bereavement.

"Methought thou wert never going to wake, my Arnon," said she, smiling fondly at me for all her sorrow; "and I began to fear I should need to mourn a double loss. Thou hast lain here two days since my servants brought you in."

"All too long to be idle when vengeance should be afoot," I answered, "for the foe hath a good start. How say the priests that I favour for recovery?"

"Passing well," said Briseis, "for Unim vouches that within three days thou wilt be well. And fret not, dear one, of vengeance. I have seen the death-shaft and read the name upon it, and already the priests and soldiers everywhere are searching the land, and offering reward for the finding of the traitress, while a hundred swift-sailing ships are scouring the seas around."

"Art a Queen indeed, wife," I said, "and never was King blessed with one so tactful and so true. But what have they done with the dead?"

"They lie in state, here in the palace, for the people to see them ere they are buried, and Unim says that until thou art able to inter them so that the prophecy may be fulfilled they must remain."

"Strange are the mercies of They who rule!" I said in the bitterness of my heart, when the dread words of that prophecy came back to me and shattered at a blow my hopes and dreams of peace and plenty in a long, calm future for my name and race; "it seemeth to me that They can have no care for human suffering, so reckless are They in inflicting it."

"Speak not ill of the Spirits, husband," said Briseis gently, "for thee have They favoured above all men in many things, and wouldst thou have all the world bow down to minister to thy every wish?"

"I am rebuked," I answered humbly, and wearily also, for I was yet weak, "but woman's faith was ever deeper, more unquestioning, than man's. Mind'st thou, dear one, the last time thou piously reproved my grumblings?"

She answered: "Yes," and, casting herself beside me on the couch we mingled our tears and talked awhile. From then I grew better and was soon able to be up and about, and attending with fitting dignity to the affairs of the nation.

Rumour and fear were abroad, unsettling the minds of the people, and the words of the prophecy were once more bruited about, and passed from lip to lip with lightning speed. It needed all my sternness and all the Queen's persuasive grace to keep our subjects from a panic of affright. The coming evil, the predicted end of the land, gave great excuse to the disaffected and the criminal, who wanted only a chance to raise and plunder the wealthy nobles, and afterwards pillage, burn, and slay to their hearts' content. I increased my army to be in readiness for any outbreak, and would have made the rich lords disgorge some of their ill-gotten gain, but these last were too strong for peaceful measures, and I could not compel them save by bringing on the terror that I feared.

Secretly, in the dead of night, I and the Priests of Truth buried the body of the Sleeper in the Sacred Grotto near the half-submerged ruins of Miropis, putting him deep down under the place where the costly couch had been. In the flashing light of the thousand lamps, at the bottom of the vast inverted cone, we laid him down for his last earthly rest, and at his side, with eyes blinded with tears, I placed my youngest son, my gentle, tender Alcis. In the right hand of each we placed the piece of money that must be paid at the entrance to the Garden of Pleasure—the Passport Piece 'tis called—and there left them together in silence, the old and the young, the general of King Monteza and the son of King Arnon, between whose births stretched an age of more than a thousand years.

Then all the priests drew away to their own apartments, save Unim, with whom I left the inside of the Grotto, and climbed up its outer stair to the summit. At the top we stood and talked, taking counsel together what course it were wise to pursue in face of the threatening danger.

"Repeat to me again the words of the prediction that is told regarding Marenso, who sleeps his last sleep beneath us," I said.

"See, the dawn is breaking," he answered evasively; "were it not better to leave it unspoken?"

"Tell it me now, I charge thee," I repeated. "As thy King, I command; as thy friend I entreat."

"For the latter tie between us I will grant thy request," said Unim, "but not for Kings may the servant of the Spirits be compelled against his will. Thus runneth the old saying: 'It is foretold that whoso wakes the Sleeper shall bury him, dead truly, in this very spot, and whoso reigneth as King of Atlantis in the day that the Sleeper dies, that King shall be the last that shall reign in this land and the end of the land itself shall not be far away. In those same words I told it to thee the first time that thou entered the Grotto, and one other thing I told thee, namely, that till thou hadst been here a third time, to fear not death."

"And the third time has come and gone!" I said. "So be it. At least I am forewarned, and will take good care of my skin from now, for I love this life, despite its evils, better than the prospect of the unknown shadows. Say, priest, can'st foretell my future now?"

Unim was silent for a space, looking up into the dome of heaven. Then he spoke, saying:

"As I told thee, Arnon, once before, I could uplift the veil so that nothing of thy remaining life should be hidden from thee, but I refused then as I refuse now, lest thy eyes be blinded and thy mind unsettled by the sight. 'Tis not well for any of the sons of men to probe too far into the secrets of existence and of destiny, and though I have the power, I have never sought to know my own end. Enough for the time is the evil and the good that cometh in its due season: enough for the present our present weal and woe."

"Art wise, my priest," I observed, "but I would dare to know all, had I the power. However, as I cannot compel thee, I must bear my soul in patience. Thinkest thou, then, that I shall be the last King of Atlantis, and that it is already doomed?"

"I think so truly," returned Unim; "for even now the sea hath gained great stretches of the land and is rising faster this last month than it has ever done before. The time will surely come, and that before many years, when the highest hills in our seagirt land will be fathoms deep under the ocean waves, and other countries may send their fleets unheeding over a waste of waters where now these fertile fields are lying."

I looked out over the pleasing landscape, reposing calm and lovely under the paling stars, and glinted here and there with gleams of coming day, and the awfulness of the desolation foreshadowed wrung a deep groan from the depths of my heart.

"Ye Spirits!" I cried, "can it be that all this land and all its citizens are doomed, and that its name and their memory shall be wiped from the earth?"

"The Spirits have given and the Spirits have power to take away," said Unim gravely; "and what the Spirit of Truth declares is just." After a long pause he went on again: "Thy duty as King, Arnon, is to face the danger fearlessly, so that the trembling thousands may take heart at thy courage and prepare to meet the avertless doom as men. Already the people clamour for the building of more ships that the province of Ulmeca may be re-conquered and so prove a refuge for them in their hour of need. I would advise that thou dost double the fleet at once and keep the builders ever at the task of making new vessels, strong and swift. So, at least, will thy subjects be pacified, even though it be labour spent in vain."

"Why should it be in vain?" I asked, for though I was loth to put my hands to war again, I was ready so to do if thereby I could save my people from the overwhelming horror.

"Have I not refused to lift the veil?" said Unim abruptly, "and wouldst thou know the end of all men? Did I not tell thee once that thou wouldst die in the arms of the sea that thou lov'st so well? What more wouldst ask?"

"Naught," I answered, "from one so chary of his knowledge!"

My heart was still sore with grief at my recent loss, and heavy with the weight of future fear, and full of resentment at the Fates, so I parted from the Priest of Truth in an ill-temper and went away with scant courtesy, nor have I set foot within or upon the Sacred Grotto since that sorrowful day.

CHAPTER XXV.

The Gathering of the Waters.

Slowly passed the first few months of the year, with the sea ever rising, and each day bringing fresh news of some shoreside hamlet or harbour submerged and deserted, some low-lying harvest land covered over with the salt waves. The people flocked to the cities and towns by hundreds and by thousands, and Kronos itself, where the waters encroached least, was now swollen to twice its former size, its streets of half finished dwellings stretching far out upon the plain.

From lowland to upland the populace retreated, from little villages to larger towns, as though safety lay in numbers—as yet all orderly, a panic being prevented by the influence of the priests, and aided by the knowledge that the builders of ships were working in relays by night and day, and that my wealth and that of many nobles was flowing like water to equip such a fleet as would enable us to retake our lost provinces and seek a refuge there for all whom their native land could not hold in future.

Many recovered courage when they saw my energy, and for a time we kept the rebellious and dishonest classes down. But nevertheless I knew that Atlantis was honey-combed with discontent at the loss of wonted luxuries, and that, deprived of her pampering wealth, she was no longer the great nation she once had been.

The hour of her prime was past and the knell of her downfall was already sounding in her ears.

With all my public cares I found time to go aboard the Ravager, and with her to sweep the seas to East and West for sign of the mysterious craft that had come upon us so silently in the gloaming, and from whence came the archer and the arrow that had slain my Alcis.

My search was vain as that of the other vessels out upon the same quest; vain as the effort of the Dreamers to find the secret of the Foodless Life.* I voyaged towards Nubia and back again to the shores of Ulmeca; I ventured far into the chilly north and southward upon the wide bosom of the tropic sea; I voyaged through calm and storm and wind and rain, under a burning sun, and under a cold and starry sky, but not a trace of that strange craft could I discover.

It had vanished as completely as though the sea had swallowed it up in the thunderstorm that burst when I lost sight of it, and so, indeed, I grew to believe in time, until there came the rude awakening.

Once upon my journeyings, I cast anchor in the bay of the little isle in the southern sea, where, in the past, I had so often started forth on pirate cruise in the self-same ship.

I landed on the well-remembered island, where still remained the ruins of the pirate settlement, but no sign of human life was left save the grass-grown plot of land where Viol and I had laid old Didron to his last long rest.

My mind teeming with the recollections of that time which still possesses a charm for me, despite my present abhorrence of sea-robbery, I wandered alone over the fairy isle, visiting the places of my youthful frolics, the paths in the dense, dark woods, the pebbly watercourses on the little hills, the sandy beaches and the tree-sheltered inlets of the palm-fringed coast, and especially that lovely little bay of shingle, where the limestone crags, all overgrown with creepers, jutted out into the emerald sea, and where the tiny breakers curved and fell with ceaseless murmur on the shelving shallows.

'Twas there I pighted my troth to my sweet and dainty Viol; 'twas there I parted from her for the last time; 'twas there I last saw my little Didron, and stroked his curly locks with my great rough hand.

"And now," thought I, "I have another bride, who is the Queen, and another son whose name is Didron. And now I am the King and have well-nigh driven all the pirates off the sea. So strange are life's changes!"

Thus thinking, sitting on the stone where Viol and I had so often sat in the byegone years, I lost my count of time, and was there when the sun went down on the edge of the sea, and the night-birds and insects began to chirp and twitter in the forest at my back. There was no moon, and many of the stars were obscured by clouds scurrying across the heavens, while a light sea-breeze played with my raven hair and fanned my bronzed and beaten visage.

My head nodded, and I dozed, and it seemed to me that out of the semi-darkness and the lulling sounds was fashioned a vision, and a symphony; a vision of Atlantis as she had been, and a symphony of spirit-music such as I had heard in the Temple of Karnac in the land of Khem.

Fancy, it may have been, or real, but this was what I saw mirrored on the pall of the tropic night:

Out of the darkness grew a sudden brilliancy, lighter then day, yet mellowed so that there was no glare to vex my eyes; and out of the stillness came a burst of melody, so loud that it filled my ears, yet softened so that I could have listened to it gladly for ever.

I thought that I was still near the bay, though I seemed to have no form or resting-place, when slowly the sea began to recede from the shore and the land rose from beneath, not sandy or damp, but covered with forests and fields, and full of strange animals roaming in their shades as though there had been no ocean there for a long time.

Following the retreating waters with my gaze, for I was not conscious of any motion, I saw that they kept on till the shores of Atlantis were reached, and between the little isle and the great land there was no more sea.

Then I saw the coast of Atlantis itself spread out, swallowing up the flying ocean to east and west, till but a narrow strait remained on either hand between it and the mighty continents that now are leagues and leagues away.

There were no cities ortowns in all its breadth then, only roving hordes of naked barbarians, fighting for their food with the savage beasts that roamed the plains or sheltered in the caves, using only rude stone implements, and eating their own slain.

But from the great land of the East, to the north of Nubia, came a swarming multitude of men, under strong and powerful chiefs whom their followers revered, skilled in the making of weapons and tools of copper and bronze, who overran the land before them like a colony of ants. Whenever their chiefs or great men died, they buried them deep in the earth, raising conical mounds above them, the largest above the greatest chiefs, and, though they had a spoken language, they had but scanty written words.

Now, at the shore of the great East land this nation split in twain, one division journeying to the south, and settling in the land that is now called Khem, or Egypt, and the other crossing the narrow strait and landing on the coast of Nubia, there multiplying greatly, driving the barbarians before them across the country from east to west, and so into what is now Ulmeca, settling down on the land they had conquered and becoming a great nation.

Then the sea fought back the shore again, and the straits widened slowly through many thousand years, till Atlantis appeared as it was when Marenso lived at Monteza's Court.

Now I know how it came about that the Egyptians buried their kings in lofty pyramids, as we did our own, and how it was that I could understand their speech so well and read their writing so easily, for a great way back our people were of the same stock, having the same customs and the same tongue.

Whilst I was yet pondering over this strange kinship, the scene darkened, then brightened again, and I saw Atlantis as it was when first I ravaged its shores and levied toll upon its wealthy sea-board towns.

Again the darkness blotted out the vision from my view, a darkness full of strange noises and mysterious mutterings, as of the entrance to the Shadows, and when the veil lifted and I looked again, I saw only a wide, wild waste of waters, heaving and tossing, and moaning, as it were, a dreary funereal dirge for the glory that was gone for ever, for the land that was buried under its waves, for the nation that was no more to be numbered among the nations of the earth.

I felt sick at heart, and the tears would have started from my eyes, had I a bodily form, when the light waned, the music died away in ghostly cadences, a sensation as of running fire shot through all my veins, and I awoke to find the night but little more advanced than when the phantasm first appeared before me.

The sea-breeze was still swaying the palms and cocoas with a soughing rustle, the little breakers were still curling on the sloping sands, dark clouds were still drifting filmily under the stars, and rousing myself resolutely and throwing off the influence of the dream, I sought out the encampment of my men, and next morning put forth to sea in the Ravager, steering straight for home.

Moody and silent I stood on the prow as the good ship clove the waters of the sun-kissed sea, plunging now through belts of yellow weed where little crabs thrived in countless swarms, now passing schools of porpoises, now followed by keen-jawed, evil-looking sharks with dorsal fins in air, and anon becalmed and making progress only with the oars.

Orlanis and the others thought I took my grief to heart, I trow, but said never a word to my face, only hinting that it was not needful for a king to work his ships. To this I answered shortly that a king could do as he pleased with his own.

When nearly half-way to our journey's end, as I was climbing the ladder to my solitary post in the first flush of the dawn, I espied a single sail to the eastward, low down on the larboard bow, scudding along with all canvas spread.

My lethargy vanished as by magic, and in less time than I had ever done it before I had the Ravager's head turned, and every stitch of her sails set and all her oars going in rhythmic, quick-succeeding strokes. Swiftly as a flying-fish through the air, we bore down on the strange craft, which showed no flag in response to our unfurling of the Royal Banner and seemed anxious only to get beyond our reach.

It was a long, stern chase, but the tough old Ravager, under her Egyptian rigging, gained on her quarry length by length, and fathom by fathom, the high-flung spray from her foaming prow dashing its briny drops into my weathered face with boisterous good-will.

We neared the fast-flying pirate-craft—for such she was—and scanning her spars and lines as we advanced, I saw that she was not the ship I sought. Still, I resolved to capture her, if only to add to my fleet, and bade the boarders get ready their grappling hooks. The distance lessened, and our ram at length came near touching the stranger's stern, when suddenly a big, burly form rose up from behind the bulwarks, an old, weather-tanned pirate, with scarred and sunburnt face, and hair and beard white as the driven snow.

"Tirhak the Pirate! By all the gods!" I cried. "Hold men, and sheath your weapons. This is no enemy of mine."

"Right glad am I to hear those words," said the tough old man, "and had I heard them sooner would not have fled from you. But, methinks, King Arnon, we have given the Ravager a sturdy chase."

"True, Tirhak," I answered, "but you know of old that Didron's ship had no match among the freebooters of the sea, while now I'll warrant she can outpace anything of timber that is afloat. But bring your bows up, and let me come aboard, that I may talk with you to better advantage."

"That will I," said he, and swung his vessel round with eagerness. Orlanis would have gone with me, but I preferred to go alone, trusting a sailor's honour more than armed protection. It was with a strange feeling that I stepped on board amongst that pirate crew, tall, strong, lusty fellows, grizzled and battle-worn, and reeking of the salt sea, and their talk full of fearless oaths as a shark's mouth of teeth; the last remnant of the old sea-dogs, whose tacit sovereign had been Didron, my foster father.

King though I was, they welcomed me with hearty goodwill, though with none of the servile cringing of the landfolk, and I sighed, almost wishing that I were once more one of them.

"You see, my men have not forgotten the name of one who was once their comrade," said white-haired Tirhak, "though 'tis over thirty years since I spoke you last on the seas. 'Twas different, then, when we pirates were reckoned passable men and our calling was a decent one. Now we are outlaws, and well-nigh banished from the ocean."

"'Tis so," said I, "yet I think it is for the best; though I sometimes long for the old days. Tell me, Tirhak, wherefore you came not openly to me at Kronos, instead of ranging these solitary waters, where no commerce now comes?"

The old man shook his head.

"I was a pirate when Dulo IX. sat on the throne, I was a pirate when Dulo X. ruled, I was one still when Briseis reigned, and I would fain be free to rove the seas as heretofore until I die, even though Didron's son be King of Atlantis.

"Also, I fought against you, though you saw me not, in the great battle of the ships, where you slew the boasting Thaska—Ha! ha. I roared till the tears came in my eyes when I heard of it!—and defeated the fleet of Quitzaal; and I feared your anger when I knew you were victorious, and remembered the language I used to you when I saw you on the slave-ship."

"Comrades should ever be careless of each other's tongues," I said, "and it was never in the nature of Arnon to bear malice for idle words."

"That I should have known," said Tirhak, "the more so, seeing that you are wedded to our gentle Queen, whom even we rough seamen would cherish and protect. And pray how fares it with the little ones?"

My brow clouded instantly, and I told him of the ship that had come out of the darkness and slain my youngest child, my friend, and my servant, and how fruitless was my search.

"'Twas a foul deed!" cried the old seaman, whose hands were red with many a deed of carnage, but who always struck fairly and in the light of day; "'twas a foul deed, and I would fain run down the strange craft if she be on these seas."

"Wilt search her out for me?" I asked, "if I give you my royal seal for safety and a warrant for food and stores in my name at any port you put in at? 'Twill be a light task, but one after your own heart. For myself, 'tis time I sat once more in Kronos."

"Will I?" echoed the pirate, his aged cheeks aglow with the prospect of active service. "Will I? I am your servant henceforth, and we will seek out and bring you this cowardly enemy though we scour every league of the ocean for her. Say you not so, my men?"

A ringing cheer rose from his crew, one and all agreeing to aid their captain in his quest.

"And now I will aboard my Ravager," I said, "unless you bring your vessel with me to Kronos for a rest."

"My resting place is here, on the free waves," answered Tirhak, "and I love not the life of cities. But one thing I would like before you leave—to see and test your famous sword, the repute of which has travelled far."

I drew "Sunderer's" shining length from its gem-set sheath at once, and gave it to him, enjoining caution in the handling of it.

"'Tis keen," he said, thumbing its edge in a way that would have made a novice to swordcraft sick, "and rings true, and is fair to look upon. I would give a year of the little life that remains to me for the having of it. By the beard of Amarunth, I would make it sing before the eyes of a few! See, comrades, how the metal shines blue, without a blemish in it."

With admiration not unmixed with awe, the blade was passed from hand to hand, the rough sailors handling it as gently as a woman tends her babe, and from the last one I received it, putting it back into its case with pardonable pride.

"I have sworn that henceforth it shall never leave me while I have strength to grasp it," I said, seeing Tirhak eyeing it greedily, "and now I must be saying, fare-you-well."

"Farewell," the old pirate answered, as I went on board my ship again and the vessels parted, one going north and one west. For a long time I could hear the sturdy seamen chanting the Ina-Ana in chorus loud and strong, its well-remembered melody floating to us across the sunlit waters with a soft, subdued, yet sonorous sound.

It was near the ruins of Miropis where we first sighted the Atlantian coast, but there was no anchorage or harbour left; even the place where the town itself had been was a fathom under the sea, and the tide's lowest ebb only uncovered the base of the Sacred Grotto. We looked at each other, I and my crew, with pale, awed faces, and saying never a word, put about and ran along the new shore-line towards Kronos, fearing lest that, too, should have been submerged in our absence, and longing to know the worst.

As we went our misgivings first increased and then diminished, for after finding that in many places the sea had gained even more than at Miropis, we saw, in nearing the capital, that the country rose gradually until the coast at last assumed its familiar form, and our keel ploughed the track of old time pursued by the home-coming ships.

But all along the shore was written desolation in letters of ruin, mutely eloquent. The villages lay dismantled and deserted, the fields were lonely, the little harbours empty, or strewn with upturned fishing boats settling down into the yellow sand, and not a sail, not a galley, not a pleasure-barque, tacked off or on the jagged line of land and water. All told of hasty flight from the ocean's resistless advance.

And so, filled with sore forboding, we hove to in the Bay of Kronos, where was gathered the fleet of seven hundred vessels, and there cast anchor and went ashore.

How gladly my Briseis welcomed me home again! vowing how solitary her life had been whilst I was away, and declaring, with all a loving woman's inconsistency, in one and the same breath, that she wished I had found the deadly foe and that she was glad I had been spared the shedding of blood!

"'Tis wearisome work," she said, "to deal with Didron and Vesta when you are not here, and to stop their constant questionings about our little Alcis. 'Twould break my heart to tell them the truth, and yet what can I say?"

We were in our own apartments then, and the two were playing with an ebon image, a little distance away.

"Come hither," I cried to them, and when they came, lifted them both upon my knees. "Should you like to know where your brother Alcis is?" I asked.

"I should; I want to know," said sturdy Didron, clutching my beard.

"I think you ought to tell us," echoed imperious little Vesta, looking at me reproachfully with her great round eyes.

"Well," I said, "he has gone to a far country where nothing dies and all the land is a garden, full of sweet-scented flowers and ripe fruit, and where all his playfellows are always merry and happy."

"But the slaves whisper that he has gone to the Shadows, like old Marenso and Arac," persisted Vesta, doubtfully.

"Then I shall be very angry with the slaves," I said, hiding my emotion with a show of displeasure, "and you must not listen to them. Arac has been buried by his people, and Marenso in the Sacred Grotto, but I saw your little brother last, before he went to the far country."

"Can we go to him some day?" asked Didron, "'cause I should like to see him again. And you, mother, and you, father, will come with us, won't you?"

"We may go sooner than you think," I answered, choking down the lump that rose in my throat, "all of us, and then we shall be parted no more."

"And will Phrena, and his father and mother be there, too?" queried Vesta, thinking of the only son of Atris.

"Yes, dear one, some day we shall all meet in that garden of delight," said Briseis.

"But I wish I had known, so that I could have wished him good-bye till then," Vesta said regretfully.

For answer I kissed them both, and setting them down, bade them go and play again.

"'Twill need not the Priest of Truth to absolve us from the sin of that half-falsehood," I said to Briseis, who looked at me with tear-filled eyes, yet answered bravely:

"No, indeed. And were it for some other cause, one could scarce forbear to laugh at Vesta's ready tongue! How quiet they are, now!"

"Too quiet," I replied. "Ho, there!" I called to the two, "send for Phrena to come and make merry with you, and be as noisy as you like! Run, jump, dance, sing, so you sound as many as of yore and I do not miss the absent one!"

They laughed, clapping their hands with delight, and soon the palace resounded with the pleasing notes of their childish amusement, and I felt more at ease.
